SEC. 7. That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act at any time is hereby reserved.

Summary of points in which the San Francisco bill (H. R. 4319) differs from the Los Angeles act.

The San Francisco bill provides in distinction from the Los Angeles act that—

1. Other cities on San Francisco Bay be allowed use of water with San Francisco's consent or by State law.

The city's plans have always contemplated that the development of the Hetch Hetchy source of water supply shall be for the benefit of all the cities about the Bay of San Francisco. The presentation of the city's case at the hearing before the Secretary of the Interior last year, as shown by the report of the advisory board of Army engineers, showed that the Freeman plan provided for the supplying of all the cities about the bay for a century hence.

2. Rights of way granted for telephone and telegraph lines, roads, trails, bridges, tramways, and railroads for use in conjunction with main purposes.

Practically the same thing is contemplated in the Los Angeles act, where, in section 4, it is provided, as in section 4 of the San Francisco grant, that free use to the Federal departments for official business shall be allowed of any telephones, telegraphs, or railroads constructed on public lands.

3. Such lands be granted for the enumerated purposes as "may be actually necessary" instead of such as the "Secretary of the Interior may deem to be actually necessary."

This is carrying out the intent of the Los Angeles grant; that is, it is, of course, intended that Congress make a grant of such lands as are actually necessary for the enumerated purposes.

4. Such lands to be granted, not for the aqueduct right of way, but for reservoirs, buildings, and so forth, "irrespective of the width or extent of said lands."

This is the clear intent of the Los Angeles grant, the limitation "not to exceed 250 feet in width," which is in both grants, being intended for the canals, ditches, pipe lines, and so forth. A reservoir, such as the Hetch Hetchy Reservoir, would be at some points from half a mile to a mile wide.

5. The taking from the public lands of stone, earth, gravel, sand, tufa, and other material actually necessary for construction purposes under conditions to be fixed by the Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture is permitted.

This is manifestly necessary.

6. Three years instead of one be allowed for filing maps.

This is simply a precaution taken, owing to material changes which the city has in the past found it necessary to make in its plans for a municipal water supply.

7. Only permanent construction work be prohibited prior to approval of maps.

San Francisco has already been granted permission by Secretary of Interior Lane, under the order of March 12, 1913, to do preliminary work.

8. Where maps have already been filed, copies of such maps may be filed in compliance with requirements of the act.

San Francisco has filed several maps, including those filed early in 1913, in conformity with the request of Secretary of Interior Fisher, and it is desired that, with reference to any such maps, the filing of copies thereof may be a sufficient compliance with the act of Congress.

9. Changes in location may be made at any time before final completion of the works instead of within two years.

It may be that a change in location may be desired by the city, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, at a time subsequent to two years after the filing of an original map. So long as this is prior to the completion of the works and is approved by the Secretary of the Interior, it is desired that the city have permission to make any such changes.

10. Existing claims prior to the city's claims shall be protected.

This is the clear intent of the Los Angeles grant.

11. Act shall not apply to lands embraced in rights of way heretofore granted to any parties other than city of San Francisco and its predecessors in interest.

The city has acquired several right-of-way privileges by purchase, some of which have been recognized by the Department of the Interior, as the Cherry Valley Reservoir site, the city being the successor in interest to the Sierra Ditch & Water Co.

12. Omits provisions that adjudication of pending applications shall not be affected.

It has been decided by the Forestry Bureau that property of application by an individual as against a city does not necessarily work to the disadvantage of a city.

13. City shall pay the United States for timber "cut, injured, or destroyed, on or adjacent to lands or rights of way as required by Secretary of Interior or Secretary of Agriculture" instead of being required to pay the Forest Service for "timber and wood cut, used, or destroyed on any of the rights of way and lands within the forest reserves hereby granted."

The city is required to pay for all timber cut, rather than only for timber cut on the rights of way, as in the Los Angeles act.

14. Omits local provisions applying to Owens River project.

This was of interest to Los Angeles only.

15. Work must be "diligently prosecuted to completion," instead of that it must begin within five years from date.

It is impracticable to specify exact dates when there is always a possibility of delay on account of litigation, etc.

16. Secretary of Interior may waive forfeiture for noncompliance with conditions of grant if he finds that city is prevented from continuing construction by unforeseen engineering difficulties or special and peculiar causes.

This is manifestly a just and proper provision. See "The National Forest Manual," issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, to take effect February 24, 1913, Regulation L, 16, and Form No. 61, page 35, the aforesaid "The National Forest Manual," article 6, article 7.

17. City may sell water to municipal water districts or irrigation districts in addition to municipalities.

This is to make possible the consummation under the law of California of a municipal water district, by which all the cities about the bay might be united, the city to sell to the district organization, which would in turn distribute to the different cities, which, again, would sell to the inhabitants thereof. Also, for the protection of such irrigation districts as the Modesto-Turlock irrigation districts, the city would want privilege of selling water to them, in order that they in turn might sell to the land owners within their districts.

18. Section 7 of Los Angeles grant is omitted.

There seems no purpose to be accomplished by including this section. The law as to right to repeal, amend, and so forth, is thoroughly established.

THE WATER SUPPLY: WARNING.

The water consumption in San Francisco now exceeds the safe, dependable supply available for distribution. Until the city or the company can increase the development of sources now owned and install more aqueducts to San Francisco, extreme care must be exercised in the use of water—

Or the supply will fail. Stop all waste; stop hosing steps and sidewalks with water. Please prevent all unnecessary use of water. We earnestly ask for your cooperation in maintaining the supply.

SPRING VALLEY WATER CO.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions and bill of the following titles:

On May 21, 1913:

H. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the postal service for the fiscal year 1913.

On May 22, 1913:

H. J. Res. 82. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the International Conference on Education; and

H. R. 4234. An act providing certain legislation for the Panama California Exposition to be held in San Diego, Cal., during the year 1915.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House meets on Monday, after the reading of the Journal, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] be permitted to address the House for one hour. I will say that that will not interfere with the Democratic caucus in any way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday next—of course, barring the usual little routine matters—the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] be permitted to address the House for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, is there any reason why the gentleman from Illinois should not announce the subject matter of the gentleman's address?

Mr. MANN. I think it is something in relation to the Forestry Service.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, would that prevent taking up any little matters that it might be desired to take up in this hour?

The SPEAKER. It would not prevent that. The practice has been that these little matters, such as the gentleman has presented and such as other Members have, are allowed to come in ahead of a request like this, although if it was literally construed, of course, as soon as the Journal was read, the gentleman from Washington would have to begin his speech. The practice is the other way—that these little matters be attended to when they take no great amount of time.

Mr. HENRY. Let me remind the gentleman that we have a caucus at 2 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. MANN. I stated that this would not interfere in any way with that caucus. If for any reason the time was occupied otherwise before the gentleman had a chance to address the House, he would not impose upon the Democratic Members or delay an adjournment in time for that caucus.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman upon what subject?

Mr. KEATING. I desire to insert an editorial from Mr. Bryan's Commoner.

Mr. MANN. For fear the Democratic Members will not get a chance to read it in any other way I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, one of the Senators from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] read into the RECORD of Tuesday an editorial from the pen of former Senator T. M. Patterson, which appeared in the Rocky Mountain News of Denver on May 11. Former Senator Patterson urged the Senators from Colorado to combine with the Senators from Louisiana for the purpose of forcing the Democratic majority in this Congress to place a duty of 1 cent a pound on refined sugar.

I wish to insert in the RECORD an editorial from Bryan's Commoner of May 23 in answer to former Senator Patterson's editorial.

The editorial is as follows:

SUGAR IN THE STATE OF COLORADO.

[From Bryan's Commoner.]

It is not often that the Commoner has occasion to differ from its esteemed friend, ex-Senator Patterson, of Colorado, but it feels it its duty to dissent from him in the matter of the sugar schedule.

It is outside of the purpose of this comment to enter into an argument upon the merits of the case. It is enough at this time to say that the arguments which Senator Patterson presents are, from beginning to end, a reproduction of the arguments that have been made for a hundred years in behalf of every industry for which protection has been asked. For a century each industry that asks for the privilege of taxing the rest of the people has been accustomed to marshal figures to show that a failure to comply with its demand would mean the sure destruction of the industry and ultimate suffering to the country.

Mr. Patterson's argument follows the protectionist line even to the final warning that the reduction may only be temporary, and that "if" favored industry is destroyed, the consumer will become the victim of higher prices. He says:

"That putting sugar on the free list will make sugar cheaper in the end is justly open to challenge, for should free sugar destroy or seriously cripple the American sugar industry the last condition of the consumer may be worse than the first."

And then he adds:

"But I make no issue on this point; only the future can determine it."

This saving clause does not save. If it is not intended as an argument, it ought not to be advanced. It is merely a speculation and indicates the extent to which Mr. Patterson has allowed his advocacy of this particular industry to lead him into the language employed by the protectionist.

The purpose of this editorial, however, is to combat the conclusion which he presses upon the Senators from Colorado. Mr. Patterson says:

"Our Senators should, it seems to me, stand side by side with the two Democratic Senators from Louisiana. They should insist that the sugar schedule be taken up and disposed of by itself."

He then proceeds to say that the tariff is being revised "in a lump," "to intimidate the weak." This is an unfair impeachment of the purposes of the party and of the motives of the President. He concludes:

"United States Senators are now elected by the people. They must even be nominated in an open primary. Patronage and White House favor will not take the place of services patriotically and faithfully performed."

This is an injustice to Senators THOMAS and SHAFROTH. He does a wrong to the Senators in suggesting that their support of the bill will be due to "patronage and White House favor." It is, in effect, an attempt to impose a different course of action upon them under the threat that they will not be considered as patriotic or faithful in the performance of their duties as Senators unless they take Mr. Patterson's view of the subject.

The Commoner is sure that its distinguished and beloved friend does not mean to set himself up as a final judge in this matter or to demand acquiescence in his opinion as the price of his confidence and good will.

Senators THOMAS and SHAFROTH were elected as Democrats, and they will be justified in considering themselves as Democrats, not merely as representatives of a particular industry. Comparatively few of the voters of Colorado are personally interested in the production of sugar. Why should the Senators from Colorado consider the wishes of sugar producers only? Have not those who pay the tax as much right to be regarded as those who receive the benefit of the tax?

And does not Mr. Patterson know that Senators THOMAS and SHAFROTH must act with the tariff reformers or against the tariff reformers? The Louisiana Senators may be willing to join with the Republicans and defeat a tariff law and thus deny to the people of the country the reform for which they have labored for so many years, but will the Senators from Colorado be performing a "patriotic and faithful" service if they cast in their lot with those who make everything subordinate to sugar?

If Mr. Patterson desires to consider the effect of the votes on their political future, why not remember that Congressman KEATING, of Colorado, was elected to the House of Representatives after boldly taking his stand in favor of free sugar? Would this not be some indication of the temper of the people of Colorado? Can Mr. Patterson give bond that the voters of his State will applaud its Senators if they become responsible for the defeat of tariff reduction? Would it not be well also for him to recall the fate of the Democratic Senators who in the past have put the interests of special industries above the demand of the Nation?

The Commoner commends the spirit in which Colorado's Senators have addressed themselves to the work of fulfilling the pledges of the party, and is glad to believe that they will consult their Democratic colleagues who are striving to assist the President in the carrying out of his high purpose rather than Senators who are willing to jeopardize the party's fate merely because they believe that some industry in which they are specially interested may suffer injustice. The injustice which the tariff has wrought for so many years still exists and that injustice will continue until the rates are materially lowered. The Senators from the sugar-producing States can not afford to make all tariff reform dependent on what they regard as fair rates to a single industry.

BRYAN VOICES COLORADO'S VIEWS.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bryan voices the sentiments of the overwhelming majority of the voters of Colorado on this sugar question.

In support of this statement, I wish space would permit me to quote the scores of editorials from Colorado papers which I have received during the last few weeks. Almost without exception the Democratic press of Colorado, outside of Denver, is vigorously supporting free sugar.

For a quarter of a century I have been connected with the papers of Denver, but I want to be placed on record now as saying that the cause of genuine Democracy in Colorado must look for support to the courageous and untrammeled country press of the State.

It is very gratifying to be able to state that the most ardent supporters of free sugar are the Democratic papers published in the cities and towns which contain sugar factories. They have disregarded the cajoleries and the threats of the sugar companies and have fearlessly championed the policy outlined by the President of the United States.

The following editorial from the Swink (Colo.) Advocate of May 23 is representative of the position taken by the independent press of the sugar towns in Colorado:

DO NOT WORRY ABOUT SUGAR TARIFF.

Regardless of the amount of discussion that the Underwood tariff bill (providing for the removal of tariff on sugar and other things) has caused, farmers of the fertile Arkansas Valley are very little worried.

Our farmers realize that this vast, rich, and productive area of the best soil in the Golden West will produce melons, alfalfa, and many grains and grasses, as well as fruits, vegetables, etc., that will enable them within a short time to forget that sugar beets ever were an income producer. And the market never will be glutted, either, with the quality of excellent products such as can be grown in this valley.

True, it may be, that sugar beets have added much to the wealth of a large portion of this valley, but it is just as true that our resourceful farmers can easily turn their hands to some other line to which both they and this splendid soil are so well adapted.

Farmers of this section of the valley are not inclined to guzzle down a lot of hot air about certain things that are "sure to happen" to them and "the whole country," if certain tariff measures become a law, and sugar factory-attachés' salaries are reduced to help make up for what the trust will "lose" in favor of the consumers.

To be sure! Our farmers are entirely too wise to be fooled, and they well know that they can and will produce just as much revenue-bringing products as ever before, and that they will get that revenue, tariff or no tariff, and the market will not be flooded, except with the highest grade of foodstuffs such as are in daily demand.

SUGAR COMPANIES EXPANDING.

That the sugar companies themselves do not believe that the removal of the tariff will destroy the sugar industry in Colorado is shown by the following item which appeared a few days ago under a Rocky Ford date line in the Pueblo Chieftain, the most uncompromising "stand-pat" Republican newspaper in Colorado:

The factory of the American Beet Sugar Co. is the busiest place in the city at the present time and the largest gang of men ever employed during the off season is now at work there. A large sum of money is being expended in the alterations and improvements which, when completed, will make the Rocky Ford factory the largest and best in the State.

With the present outlook on tariff regarding sugar the company realizes that if it is to continue the manufacture of beet sugar it must devise every plan possible to manufacture the product with as little expense as possible, and improved machinery will be installed to do all the work possible, thereby keeping the pay roll down to the minimum.

Mr. Speaker, I want to heartily indorse the testimony given by this Republican witness. Efficiently and economically managed, Colorado sugar factories can compete with the world.

SENTIMENT OF BUSINESS MEN.

The following letter, which I have just received from the secretary of the Gilpin County (Colo.) Chamber of Commerce, reflects the sentiments of that element in Colorado's business life which has refused to be stampeded by the calamity howling of the beneficiaries of the sugar tariff:

CENTRAL CITY, COLO., May 26, 1913.

Congressman EDWARD KEATING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Am writing you to apprise you of the attitude of the Gilpin County Chamber of Commerce, in regard to the petition which the Denver Chamber of Commerce will shortly forward to the Colorado Members of Congress in reference to the sugar tariff. Following is the telegram received by our organization from Denver:

"DENVER, COLO., May 24, 1913.

"W. J. STULL,
"Secretary Gilpin County Chamber of Commerce,
"Central City, Colo.:

"All commercial organizations of Denver are joining with the chamber of commerce in petition to President and Congress, asking that the three-year clause placing sugar on the free list be eliminated. We would like your concurrence in order to help protect one of Colorado's greatest industries. Please wire answer collect by Monday if possible.
"DENVER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE."

Following is the reply I sent, after interviewing a large number of our citizens. One leading Republican, who is favorable to free sugar, said if it was necessary he could circulate a petition among the members of his party, showing that they were also in favor of the elimination of the tariff on sugar.

"CENTRAL CITY, COLO., May 26, 1913.

"DENVER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
"Denver, Colo.:

Sentiment in this county is very strong in favor of free sugar and would like sugar on the free list now instead of in three years. We do not believe in a tariff policy for the benefit of the comparatively few engaged in or connected with an industry as against the many numbered among the consumers. The greatest good to the greatest number is the policy which should guide the commercial organizations of Colorado in the upbuilding of the State.

"GILPIN COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
"W. J. STULL, Secretary."

Respectfully, W. J. STULL.

THE CURRENCY.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by Mr. Festus J. Wade, of St. Louis, to the American Bankers' Association on the currency question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, one of the great questions that demands the attention of the Congress of the United States is the necessity of a change in the banking system, and one that will provide a more elastic currency. Under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject, I include an address by Festus J. Wade, of St. Louis, Mo., delivered before the trust-company section of the American Bankers' Association in the city of New York on the 8th instant. Mr. Wade is one of the leading financiers and bankers of this country. He is president of the Mercantile Trust Co., of St. Louis, and also president of the Mercantile National Bank, of the same city. His address follows:

"I have come a thousand miles from the interior of this country to make an urgent appeal for help, for aid, for assistance. I appeal to those from the far West, the Middle West, the North, and the South for help; I appeal to the New York bankers present, and also those ambitious to be New York bankers. I appeal to you regardless of your political affiliation, social or financial condition, or religious belief for help. I appeal to you as American citizens to join forces in an endeavor to bring about a reduction in the high cost of living, and to stop the invidious tirade against railroads, which is gradually and insidiously undermining the good sense and economic principles of the whole Nation.

"There are several causes for the present high cost of living. To-night I will touch upon only one, and that is the weak financial credit system of the Government, with monetary laws totally inadequate to meet the needs of our ever-growing commerce. To solve that serious problem why not adopt ordinary business methods, first, by endeavoring to discover the foundation of the evil, and, secondly, the remedy to be applied.

"There is no problem without a solution; no difficulty insurmountable by the American people; no enterprise too large; no undertaking too great for them to carry to a successful issue if they can once be aroused to join hands and hearts in a united effort for the benefit of mankind. Such has been the history of the American Republic since its birth 137 years ago.

"If you have in your respective establishments a well-regulated credit department, you frequently refer to the manager of same to keep you posted in regard to various borrowers whose credit you have reason to believe a shade doubtful. If that manager should demonstrate to you that a certain corporation was keeping up its credit through fictitious means not generally understood by the public, then your confidence would be shaken, and if that credit manager further demonstrated to you that the rate at which the stockholders of that particular corporation were borrowing money was 25 per cent to 50 per cent higher than paid by competitors, then you would hesitate and cease to make further loans until you could investigate the cause, with a view to applying a remedy that would increase the security to your trust company and the profits of the corporation, that your loan might be more secure. If in your investigation you discovered the corporation's methods and systems to be antediluvian, unsound, unscientific, you would immediately send for the head of the establishment you had been lending money to and point out to him the inherent weakness found, and then insist that proper and conservative methods of conducting that business be applied.

"In dealing with an economic question concerning a corporation, the same principles may be applied to the Government; the people are the stockholders; the Government officials the officers and directors. If the Government is financed upon an unsound basis, its officers know it. If true, then you must admit a governmental wrong which ought to be righted. On the other hand, if the financial basis of the Government be unsound, and the governmental officials are ignorant of that fact, then they are proven incompetent.

"Even those who have given the matter only casual consideration acknowledge that the Government 2 per cent bond is kept at par on a fictitious financial basis. You and I, and every other thinking banker, know these bonds are not held by the people of the United States, but through a fictitious financial scheme are deposited in Washington as security for the issuance of national-bank circulation, or governmental deposits. England, France, Germany, and Italy, notwithstanding their stupenduous expenditure for army and navy, have their Government securities on a 3½ per cent basis, which is about the average annual banking rate of discount in the financial centers of Europe—London and Paris—on all railroad and commercial loans. The average rate of bonded interest paid by the great railway companies of England will not exceed 3½ per cent; while here in the United States our Government bonds are on a 2 per cent basis, fictitiously bolstered up, and the railroads of our great country are on a 7 per cent basis for their enormous requirements.

"Why is it the discount rate in London and Paris to-day on prime commercial bills is only 3½ per cent? Why is it the average rate throughout England and France the last 10 years has not been over 4 per cent except when financing a money stringency in America? Because they are on a sane financial basis; their monetary laws are sound and safe. They have not, within the recollection of any man in this hall to-night, ever suspended cash payments. They have had their great crises, disasters, misfortunes, panics, but have never yet repudiated their obligations nor declined to pay gold or currency as we did in the dark days of 1907 and 1893.

"The facts are, to enable the corporation (our Government) to sell its 2 per cent bonds at par, legislators have obliged stockholders (the people), by failure to revise the monetary laws, to pay on an average more than 6 per cent to finance large railroads and industrial enterprises, because of our weak financial system.

"Occupying as we do a most enviable position in the realms of commerce, and possessing an inexhaustible fund of ingenuity, energy, and indomitable spirit; with agricultural resources and manufacturing industries constantly increasing; with commercial establishments and financial institutions on a firmer basis than ever before, the rate of money charged our people is abnormally high—all because of the inherent weakness of our monetary laws.

"Appeal after appeal has been made to Congress by merchants, manufacturers, and other classes, but I have not heard of a concerted and united appeal being made by the trust companies of the country, although out of a total of all deposits in all banks and financial institutions in the country the trust companies represent fully 30 per cent. And with this great power behind them they have practically sat silently by and left the work of reformation of the monetary system almost entirely to the national banks.

"At present the only system of expanding the currency of the Nation is through bond-secured currency of the national bank. The national banks represent only 38 per cent of the banking interests of the United States. Forty years ago, as a measure to overcome the ravages of war, it accomplished wonders, but it is entirely obsolete in the present day and generation, and no one will, on reflection, insist that the note-issuing power or privilege be given to the national bank to the exclusion of the State institutions, provided always that the State institutions—private and State banks and trust companies—comply with the strict letter of the law governing national banks.

"In England and France large corporations buy money on a 3½ per cent basis. In this country they must pay at least 6 per cent. Therefore the European manufacturer or railroad operator has an advantage over us of fully 40 per cent in the interest he is obliged to pay for every dollar borrowed, yet in the face of this fact the tariff on nearly every product will be lowered and increased competition created, while as yet no effort has been put forth to reduce the high cost of money, the primary cause of which is our weak monetary and credit system. Lower the tariff if you will, but when you do so, correct your monetary laws to make your interest rates lower and steadier.

"And now I come back to my appeal for help—not personal help from the East, West, North, or South, but for a united effort from all parts of the country—all its people; help for Senator OWEN, of Oklahoma, and Congressman GLASS, of Virginia, as chairmen of the respective congressional Committees on Banking and Currency, in so revising the monetary laws as to put trust companies, national and State banks, on an equal basis and create a flexible credit currency that will meet the necessities of the Nation's development. And with equal emphasis do I beg, nay, urge and plead, that Senator OWEN, of Oklahoma, and Congressman GLASS, of Virginia, appeal to the greatest bankers of this great Nation—a preponderance of them are found in New York City—to give them counsel and advice in the forming of a bill that will meet the needs of the Nation. To ignore New York City and its great financiers in the forming of such a measure would, in my judgment, be almost fatal to its being constructed on proper lines. Every bank west of the Hudson River, every locality west of the Hudson River, must and do appeal to New York in times of distress and go there to lend its money in times of redundancy. New York is the mecca of the Nation on financial matters, the financial center of the United States, and with proper monetary laws would immediately become the financial center of the world. Its financiers have the practical experience so necessary to give counsel and advice on such a vitally important question. Properly revised monetary laws will bring about a reduction in interest rates to borrowers, encouraging the owners of the farm, the mine, the factory, to increase their productions, and thus lowering the cost of living.

"No monetary plan should be submitted to Congress for vote unless it gives trust companies an equal right with banks, both State and National, to participate in carrying the burdens of this country and also to participate in any benefits accruing from a reformation of the monetary system.

"I know at first blush trust-company officials will put up a vigorous protest at being placed on the same plane as national banks in carrying the reserve required under the present system. They will claim the character of the trust-company business is so different from that of the national bank they do not require a reserve. I simply refer you to the panic of 1907, and, without mentioning names, call your attention to the fact that trust companies, the same as any other financial institution, require a reserve against demand deposits to meet emergencies in times of distress and to be on a sound basis in placid times.

"National banks will protest against this doctrine of allowing trust companies to participate in all of the benefits that might accrue from a reformation of the monetary laws, and one of their first objections will be: 'How can a trust company be permitted to issue currency?' The answer is plain and simple: If they comply with every requirement as to security, supervision, and reserve, the same as national banks, why should they not be permitted to have all the privileges and prerogatives of national banking institutions? Mark you, I say, provided they comply with all the obligations of the national institutions.

"When I advocate again that the privilege be given national banks of loaning on real estate, say, to the extent of 10 or 15 per cent of their gross deposits, confining them strictly to the limit of owning or loaning not more than 10 per cent of their gross deposits, I know it will be met with a storm of protest, and I shall doubtless be subjected to severe and honest but undesirable criticism. Nevertheless, I here and now assert that nothing could occur that would so tend to reduce the cost of living as to allow the 7,000 national banks in the country to loan, under proper supervision, 10 to 15 per cent of their $8,360,000,000 deposits on real estate, thus encouraging development of the agricultural as well as the industrial resources of the Nation. At present the national banks of the country own over $200,000,000 real estate, principally office buildings. How much more safely would that be invested in, say, 200,000 mortgages on good farms, and how greatly this would reduce the interest rate to the farmers, enabling them to produce more at less cost.

"The second topic which I am going to discuss to-night is the adverse, drastic, foolish legislation that has been directed against railroads, which represent the greatest purchasing power of any branch of trade or commerce in the country. Why is it railroad companies are unable to find a market for their securities at a reasonable rate? Why have they had to resort to the short-time note issues which bear tremendous discounts and high rate of interest? Simply because on the one side organized labor the last 10 years has demanded and secured increased wages of from 15 to 40 per cent; on the other hand, legislators in different States have demanded a decrease in railroad rates of from 25 per cent to 50 per cent, thus creating fear, making it more difficult to finance railroad bonds and notes, and actually have increased the yearly cost of hiring money 20 per cent to 30 per cent. Is it not therefore manifest, with this increase in expenditures and decrease in revenue, that the cost of living is not only increasing to the danger point but that the very lifeblood of the Nation is threatened with ruin and disaster?

"Therefore I appeal to you as trust-company men not only to lend a helping hand but to bend every energy to arrest the tirades directed against corporations in general and railroads in particular. To do this in a practical way, urge all your friends in the various State legislatures, and particularly your Senators and Congressmen, to study and understand the situation, to the end that they will not only advocate but urge the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant the increase of 5 per cent in the railroad rates, as now asked by the railroads, to meet existing conditions, bearing in mind that it costs the railroads of our country annually to buy money 40 per cent more than railroads of competing nations, while transportation rates charged by the roads of France, Germany, England, Russia, Austria, and Italy are more than 75 per cent higher than in the United States. Your efforts in this direction will redound to the benefit of the whole country, enable the railroads to keep up their present high standard of service, install even more effective safeguards for the protection of life, and better equip themselves for the further development of the wonderful and marvelous natural resources of our great country. This will increase the productions of the factory, farm, and mine, supply an abundance of food and raiment to the people, thus showing a net earning capacity sufficient not only to justify and demand but to be able to buy money at a proper and legitimate rate, the same as exists in Europe at the present time. When railroads are forced to reduce rates to a point making it almost impossible to meet obligations, the greatest purchasing power of the country is hampered and retarded, dissatisfaction ensues, investors the world over discredit the securities.

"In conclusion, let us resolve before we leave this banquet hall to-night that we will shun as we would a pestilence any individual, be he pauper or millionaire, banker or artisan, manufacturer, farmer, or politician, who decries the railroad simply because it is a railroad, wealth merely because it is wealth, for such an individual is an enemy to society and a menace to the Government."

FOREST SERVICE.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a resolution which I am going to introduce and upon which I am going to speak next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a resolution which will be the text of his remarks next Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a special committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives from the Members of that body, which committee is hereby empowered and directed to make a complete and thorough investigation of the conditions, the methods, and practices of the Forest Service.

SEC. 2. That said committee is especially hereby empowered and directed to make a complete investigation of the following facts:

First. The giving to the Santa Fe Railroad and the Northern Pacific Railroad, and other private corporations, more than 2,000,000 acres of valuable public land, most of it timbered, in exchange for an equal number of acres of barren treeless and practically worthless land, included in forest reserves.

Second. What relation exists, if any, between the Forest Service, the Weyerhaeuser syndicate, the Northern Pacific Railroad, and other large timber owners of the Pacific Northwest, and especially as to what understanding there is, if any, in regard to the fixing of prices of timber and as to the keeping of timber off the market.

Third. As to why many million acres of nontimbered lands are included and kept in the forest reserves.

Fourth. The reason for the creation and the maintaining of forest reserves in Alaska.

Fifth. As to why five or six billion feet of merchantable timber annually rots in the forest instead of being cut, and why only $1,000,000 worth is sold while $15,000,000 worth is permitted to decay.

Sixth. The character, competency, and conduct of those employed in the Forest Service.

SEC. 3. That said committee shall report to the House all the facts disclosed by said investigation and what legislation, if any, it deems advisable in relation thereto.

SEC. 4. That said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to sit and act during the sessions or recess of Congress at such place or places as may be found necessary and to require the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and other documents, by subpœna or otherwise, to swear such witnesses and take their testimony orally or in writing.

SEC. 5. That said committee is hereby authorized to employ such counsel and experts and clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to perform its duties hereunder.

SEC. 6. That the Speaker shall have authority to issue subpœnas for witnesses, upon the request of the committee, during the recess of Congress in the same manner as during the sessions of Congress.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 2, 1913.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, some time since I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution (S. Res. 64) amending Rule XII was adopted. I desire to call that matter up for consideration at this time. It is in the nature of a privileged motion, I take it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the rule.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XII be amended as follows:

"3. Immediately after and before the result of each roll call is ascertained and announced the Secretary shall call the names of the absentees."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas on the 1st of May entered a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate adopting this amendment to the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has unanimous consent been yet obtained to consider it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that I was the author of that rule. I had hoped that the purpose which was accomplished in the House by a like rule would be accomplished here, to wit, stopping Senators from coming in after a roll call and calling the attention of the President and having their names called, and then being recorded. In the House, however, immediately after the second roll call no Member of the House can consume the time of the body in stating why he was not present or in having himself recorded.

I find that I merely put in one additional roll call while Senators keep up the old abuse. I think the amendment ought to be reconsidered and defeated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when the amendment was offered I called the attention of the Senate to it and stated that I thought it was a mistake; and I remember well saying that I thought it would be reconsidered within the next two months. I think not quite that time has elapsed. I certainly approve of a reconsideration of the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would have saved time if the vote had been announced immediately after the second roll call, but the clerks always waited to let Senators stray in.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have devoted a considerable part of my life to the practice of the law, and one of the things which came to my knowledge that I profited by was never to argue a case after the court had announced a decision in my favor.

In view of the statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I do not think it necessary to advance any reason why the rule should be reconsidered, but I think the occasion is significant in the fact that it demonstrates the futility of attempting to improve upon the present rules of the Senate. They are the result of evolution and experience, and nearly every one has been evoked by sound common sense and the temperate sentiment of the Senate.

With this statement I believe I will desist.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, in a matter of this importance I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to reconsider the vote upon the amendment to the rule, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. It is moved to reconsider the vote by which paragraph 3 was added to Rule XII. The paragraph reads:

3. Immediately after and before the result of each roll call is ascertained and announced the Secretary shall call the names of the absentees.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask for the yeas and nays.

INVESTIGATION OF ATTEMPTS TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the permission of the Senate that the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary may sit during the sessions of the Senate in making the investigation directed by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until Thursday next at 2 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Senators will find upon their desks Senate Document No. 45. It is a comparison of the rates of duty levied by the tariff act of 1909 and the bill H. R. 3321, as passed by the House of Representatives. It also shows the corresponding rates in the chemical, metal, sugar, cotton, and wool bills of 1912, and the equivalent ad valorems in all those measures, based upon the importations for the fiscal years 1911 and 1912.

In explanation, Mr. President, so that there will be no misunderstanding in Senators' comparisons of rates, I want to call attention to the following facts: The 1912 chemical bill passed the other House, but failed in the Senate; therefore the comparisons are made upon the chemical bill as it passed the House. The comparisons are made upon the metal schedule, the sugar schedule, the cotton schedule, and the wool schedule as those bills passed the Senate. In the metal schedule there were only two amendments made in the Senate. They had reference to pig iron and ferromanganese, so that there would have been very little difference in the comparison either with the House bill or the Senate bill. The sugar bill came from the other House providing for free sugar, but it was changed in the Senate. I have therefore made the comparisons of the rates with the Senate bill. The cotton bill was the same, both in the House and in the Senate.

The wool bill came from the House with certain rates, and the Senate passed the bill changing those rates. The bill went into conference, and different rates than those provided in either the House or Senate bill were agreed upon. The comparison is made upon the bill as it was passed by the Senate.

I wanted to make this explanation, so that when Senators compare the rates they may know exactly what bills the comparisons were based upon.

Mr. President, I have had prepared by Thomas J. Doherty, the special attorney, Customs Division, Department of Justice, notes on tariff revision in 1913, being comments on the meaning and effect of the changes in the phraseology of the tariff law made by the bill H. R. 3321 as it passed the House of Representatives, noting the errors therein, and offering suggestions as to the necessity for amendment thereof. I ask that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. What is it the Senator from Utah desires, Mr. President?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah whether it would not be well to print the explanation he has made of this document as a note upon its first page?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada suggests that, I can have my explanation printed as a slip and put on the first page of the comparisons. I will gladly do that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, in answer to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I will state that my request was to have printed as a public document notes on the tariff revision of 1913, compiled by Thomas J. Doherty, special attorney, Customs Division, Department of Justice.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand that the matter is prepared by some official in the Department of Justice?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that it is a criticism of the House tariff bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, it is calling attention to the different phraseology of the House bill as compared with the present law, and what effect such change will have upon the items as enumerated in each of the schedules.

Mr. SIMMONS. In other words, it is an argument made by an official in the Department of Justice?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no argument in the document. It is simply a statement of facts as they exist and showing the difference in the phraseology.

Mr. SIMMONS. I object to its being printed as a document until I can have time to examine it.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina that Mr. Doherty was the gentleman who compiled the notes on the tariff in the year 1909. This is simply following out the work that was done by him in the House of Representatives in 1909, and it will give information to every Senator. I say to the Senator now that it would take Senators hours and days and weeks of time to find the information contained in the document if it is not printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not expect, Mr. President, to examine the whole batch of papers which the Senator from Utah has before him; but I think before this document, prepared by a Government official, with reference to a bill which is pending before the Senate, is printed, the majority members of the Finance Committee should have an opportunity to look at and examine it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection, of course, if the Senator wishes to examine the document.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the only reason I ask that the request for its printing go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that every Senator here ought to have this information in considering the tariff bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is rather a remarkable performance, Mr. President, that an official of the Government should be preparing notes upon the tariff bill without any knowledge of the majority members of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. It is only a glossary.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean to say that there is anything wrong in it, but I do mean to say that I think the majority members of the Committee on Finance should have an opportunity to examine it and to ascertain its character.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the least objection to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, with reference to the compartive statement of rates of duty prepared by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for the minority members of the committee and laid upon the desks of Senators this morning, I have nothing to say except that I think probably the comparison is somewhat inadequate and does not embrace everything that should be contained in a compilation of this character. The majority members of the committee have prepared a similar comparison, which was printed probably 10 days ago, and which I thought had been distributed among the Members of the Senate, but probably it has not yet been sent out. That comparison, I think, is very much more comprehensive than the statement prepared by the Senator from Utah. I am not at all criticizing the statement prepared by the Senator from Utah. I think in the main it follows the line of the statement that we have prepared, but we have added in our statement some things which I think are not embraced in that prepared by the Senator from Utah, and his statement embraces probably one or two matters not embraced in ours.

I am very glad the Senator from Utah has prepared this compilation, because, after the Senate committee has acted upon the tariff bill, there will have to be a revised print, and I should like at that time, in consultation with the minority members, to prepare a revised comparison, so as to embrace all of the different columns and include all the data that are thought necessary in order to advise Senators as to the material matters in connection with the revision of the tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in this comparative statement he will notice that I have left three columns blank for the purpose of adding to the comparison as soon as the bill is reported to the Senate with the changes which may be made by the Committee on Finance of the Senate; and then, as soon as that is done, I think the comparison will be complete. Of course, I have no idea as to what errors the Senator refers——

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not mean errors. I have not examined the statement, and I do not know whether there are any errors or not; but I said that the Senator's table was not quite so comprehensive as the one which I had caused to be prepared and which has been ready for distribution for 10 days. I will state to the Senator that the tables which I have caused to be prepared contain, in addition to the imports of various articles, the exports of those articles. I notice that in the Senator's statement the column for exports is left blank.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is only left blank in places where it was impossible to ascertain what the exact exports were, but wherever——

Mr. SIMMONS. I merely ran through the first and second pages.

Mr. SMOOT. Wherever exports were available from the department, they have been embodied in this comparison.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that there are quite a number of headings in the comparison I have submitted that are not found in the comparison referred to by the Senator, but I think there is no question about the result. I think the Senator and I can arrive at an understanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the main the tables run together. In ours the exports have probably been sought out a little more diligently than in the Senator's statement, and we have some statistics in ours with reference to the labor cost of various and sundry items which the Senator leaves out of his tables.

What I meant to say, Mr. President, was that after the bill had been acted upon by the committee, so that we could fill in the columns with reference to the rates fixed by the Senate committee, then, following the usual course in such cases, I shall desire to confer with the minority members, and we will make up a comparative statement so as to embrace in it everything that both sides or either side may desire to have included.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WEEKS presented a resolution adopted by the Massachusetts Peace Society, favoring the repeal of the clause in the Panama Canal law exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

He also presented a memorial of the Southern New England Textile Club, remonstrating against the passage of the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Trade of Beverly, Mass., favoring an appropriation being made for the purchase of suitable homes for American representatives in foreign countries, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I present a letter from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., transmitting a resolution passed by that body, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the letter and accompanying resolution were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Poughkeepsie, N. Y., May 31, 1913.

Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find copy of resolution passed by the Poughkeepsie Chamber of Commerce at the last regular meeting.

Trusting that you can see your way clear to conscientiously support this movement, I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly, HOWARD E. TAYLOR, Secretary.

At the regular meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., the following resolution was unanimously passed:

Whereas the United States, contrary to the custom of the leading powers, does not own buildings in foreign countries for its representatives, with the result that our commercial interests suffer in competition with other nations for the expansion of our foreign trade; and

Whereas we believe that no representative of our Government abroad should be called upon to make expenditures from his private fortune or that it should be necessary for him to have one in order to maintain our dignity in foreign countries; and

Whereas we believe that representatives should reside at a permanent home which our Government should supply, to which our citizens could point with pride, and where they may come and go with the same freedom as that existing at the White House at Washington, and believing that it reflects upon our national dignity for one representative to live in a palace and for his successor to live in a flat, and that neglect to provide residences precludes the Nation from obtaining the services of many eminent citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we are heartily in favor of the United States owning buildings that will reflect credit on the Nation; that will combine the office with the residence, and of such size that representatives may maintain them on pay; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, requesting them to use their best efforts in supporting any bill that may be introduced to carry out the object of this resolution.

COLLECTION OF CUSTOMS DUES.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I submit a concurrent resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 3) was read, as follows:

Whereas during the last administration President Taft promulgated an order whereby it is proposed on the 1st day of July, 1913, to consolidate the business and transfer the collection of customs dues from the various ports in the State of New Jersey to the cities of New York and Philadelphia; and

Whereas the enforcement of said order would inflict great financial loss and inconvenience to the shippers and other business interests at such ports in that State: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to withhold all action calculated to carry into effect the provisions and requirements of said order of consolidation until further action by the Senate and House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, this is a resolution of a very sweeping nature. If we adopt it, similar action should be taken in at least 20 other cases. It seems to me the resolution should go to a committee.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will permit me, I should be quite willing that it might be so amended. I feel, however, that it is of prime importance that this matter should be acted on, and acted on promptly.

The order promulgated by President Taft a few days prior to the expiration of his administration carried this consolidation into effect on July 1. As to my own State, for which I drew the resolution, we would be very seriously affected. The city of Newark, a city of over 400,000 population, to-day a port of entry, a city that has expended large sums of money in wharf enterprises and other facilities for shipping interests, would be sidetracked, and all business of that character would be carried to the city of New York, 15 miles distant.

The great problem in the great city of New York to-day, more, perhaps, than in any other city, is the congestion of wharfage, water facilities, dock transportation, and the like; and it is a matter of prime necessity that rather than adding to that congestion it should be lessened.

This order has raised a storm of disapprobation in the State. I hold in my hand clippings from prominent papers protesting against the carrying out of the order. I should like very much to have it take in all the ports along the Atlantic coast.

I believe the little matter of economy that has been urged in this regard is too trifling to be considered. You can not measure matters of economy entirely by the saving of a few dollars. There is something more important than that. There is something in the local pride and the enterprise of a community.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter into any extended discussion of the subject. The order was made by President Taft in pursuance of a legislative provision in the sundry civil act, which originated in the House. It would be a very sudden step to take to annul that order utterly, as proposed by this resolution. I may say, further, that there is a bill pending on the subject, which was referred first, I think, to the Committee on Commerce; and either that bill or another of similar tenor is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary. The question of validity having been raised, and a request having been made of the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion on the subject, we certainly should wait for that before we take any action.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say, Mr. President, that a bill has been introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce to suspend the operation of this order for two years. At the instance of the committee that bill was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury for a report. I think the resolution ought to go to that committee and ought to go to the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion and report.

I accordingly move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, but I desire that prompt action may be had. I realize that the month will slip around before we know it; and it would be a very serious situation for us, in my little Commonwealth, to be thus placed. However, I submit to the proposal to refer the resolution to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS (S. DOC. NO. 52).

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have printed as a public document a statement, prepared by the retiring Commissioner General of Immigration, in regard to the operation of the present immigration law. It is a short and very valuable statement as to the workings of the present law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

UNITED STATES V. THE CHANDLER DUNBAR WATER POWER CO. (S. DOC. NO. 51).

Mr. BURTON. I ask to have printed as a public document a decision of the Supreme Court recently rendered in the case of the United States against The Chandler Dunbar Water Power Co. and others. The decision has an important bearing on a question discussed at great length in the last Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MIDSHIPMEN AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there is a bill on the calendar—Senate bill 2272—which is very urgent, and the early passage of which is very important. Every Senator is interested in it. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2272) providing for an increase in the number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy after June 30, 1913.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill at this time, but I shall object to any further unanimous-consent agreements.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that after June 30, 1913, and until June 30, 1919, there shall be allowed at the Naval Academy 2 midshipmen for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, 1 for Porto Rico, 2 for the District of Columbia, and 10 appointed each year at large. Midshipmen on graduation shall be commissioned as ensigns in the Navy, or may be assigned by the Secretary of the Navy to fill vacancies in the lowest commissioned grades of the Marine Corps or Staff Corps of the Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I expect to vote for this bill, but I should like to call the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the condition of the lower grades in the Navy.

There are now 351 lieutenants, 188 junior lieutenants, and 722 ensigns whose ages do not vary more than 7 or 8 years, and there are in the Naval Academy 763 midshipmen. So that, all told, there are nearly 2,000 officers the oldest of whom is not over 37 years of age and the youngest not under 20 years.

Necessarily, unless there is going to be a very large increase of the Navy, that will make a "hump" which will absolutely destroy promotions and the effectiveness of the younger officers in these grades. For instance, a man who is now at the foot of the ensigns' list can not reach the lieutenants' list before he is 40 years of age, in the ordinary course of promotions.

I hope the Committee on Naval Affairs will take time to consider the proper disposition to be made of these younger officers. My own judgment is that some method should be adopted of mustering out a certain proportion of them, so that promotion will be facilitated and the better men will be retained in the service, because the tendency now is for many of these men, seeing the stagnation ahead of them, to retire from the service. I have seen it stated in the public press that the Secretary of the Navy is opposed to allowing men to resign, so that that course, if followed, will absolutely prevent the easy flow of promotions which should obtain in the service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTMASTER AT SALEM, OHIO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution coming over from a previous day.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 94) submitted by Mr. BURTON on May 29, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested and directed—

1. To transmit to the Senate all papers relating to the appointment of a postmaster at Salem, Ohio.
2. To investigate and inform the Senate whether such postmaster was recommended under an agreement that, if appointed, he would, as a condition of such appointment, publish a Democratic newspaper.
3. To inform the Senate whether it is the policy of the department that postmasters shall devote the whole of their time to the duties of their office; and if so, whether such condition was imposed in the case of this office.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does this resolution come up on motion or on a request for unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It comes over from a previous day.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] interposed an objection to the adoption of the resolution the last day the Senate was in session.

It seems to me the second part of the resolution, directing an investigation by an executive department of the Government, is not a proper subject for action by the Senate. As this confirmation of the Salem postmaster is before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, it seems to me the proper course to pursue in connection with the resolution is to refer it to the Post Office Committee, with instructions to report to the Senate what part of the matter should be investigated and what part should not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who introduced this resolution, has been called from the Chamber and before the Judiciary Committee, but he requested me to present and have read from the desk, if permitted, a portion of an editorial from the Salem Daily Herald of March 1, 1913. I ask that the part marked in the editorial may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan, first, who is the editor of the paper and, secondly, what are his politics?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The editor of the paper is the man who has been nominated for postmaster and in reference to whom the investigation is proposed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I have no objection to hearing it read.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I take it for granted he is a Democrat, or will be hereafter, according to his statement about to be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Reading from the Salem Daily Herald, Salem, Ohio, Saturday, March 1, 1913——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to state that the first portion of the article which is to be read is a quotation from a letter which the Congressman from the Salem district, who, according to the editorial, entered into this arrangement with the editor of the paper, wrote to that editor, and the latter is the man who is nominated for the Salem post office according to the agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

WHITACRE'S LETTER.

After considering carefully the Salem post-office appointment, I have arrived at the following conclusions:

The candidates for the appointment of postmaster of Salem have been my friends in past campaigns, and therefore I feel kindly to them. This much, however, is a certainty, while all are entitled to recognition, only one can be favored.

The office is not entirely to be given in return for personal obligations on my part. The Democracy of the county is to be considered, and I am of the opinion that the cause of Democracy can best be promoted through live and energetic newspapers.

Without entering into any discussion, if Mr. Gee, the editor of the Herald, will agree to run a genuinely Democratic newspaper and will help to put the "gangsters" in both parties out of business, I think he should get the post office.

I am sending this letter to the other candidates for the post office, and I shall put the proposition up to Mr. Gee, so that we will have an understanding about the course of the paper. I am not so much interested for myself, for the best thing that could happen to me would be to get out of politics, and unless I change my mind again I will be out—but I am merely stating my feelings at the present time.

My present intention is to name Mr. Gee, providing I get a satisfactory answer with respect to the course of the Herald.

Very truly, yours,

J. J. WHITACRE.

GEE'S REPLY TO WHITACRE.

In reply to the above communication Mr. Gee Saturday sent the following telegram to Congressman WHITACRE:

SALEM, OHIO, March 1, 1913.

Hon. J. J. WHITACRE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Your communication of the 28th ultimo received, and your proffer of the postmastership in Salem is accepted, together with the conditions imposed. Kindly accept the thanks of not only myself, but also of the host of friends who so stanchly supported me during my campaign. Letter will follow.

GEORGE H. GEE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I understand the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] suggests that the second paragraph in the resolution should be eliminated. My attention has been called to the fact that the Postmaster General objected to the word "investigate"; that he was quite willing to proceed to furnish the other things asked for in the resolution, but he did not care to institute an investigation. The senior Senator from Ohio has instructed me to say for him that he has no objection to eliminating the words "investigate and," so that the second paragraph shall read:

To inform the Senate whether such postmaster was recommended under an agreement—

And so on.

I ask the Senator from Virginia if he has any objection with those words eliminated, inasmuch as the Postmaster General has no objection to furnishing the information?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Postmaster General has none. He only objected to the words "to investigate," as he did not consider that the Senate should undertake to direct him to make an investigation. If an investigation is to be made, it should be made by the committee of the Senate itself.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, Mr. President, I move to amend the resolution by striking out, in line 5, the words "investigate and," so that the paragraph will read:

2. To inform the Senate whether such postmaster was recommended—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to strike out the words which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, before the word "inform," strike out the words "investigate and."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not know that we should pass this first paragraph. The Postmaster General has no objection at all to it, and in this particular instance there is no objection to it; but as a general rule it would be highly improper to direct that the testimonials with reference to a particular appointment shall be sent to the Senate in open session.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of course, has had all these papers within its reach all the time. The Senator from Michigan is a member of that committee, and he will understand that the Postmaster General is at all times willing to furnish for the use of the committee any recommendations or papers in his office with reference to a particular nomination. It, however, belongs to executive business. There are many reasons why testimonials and adverse criticisms should be handled in executive session alone. It would be exceedingly unfortunate to air all the adverse criticisms that are sometimes filed in connection with appointments.

I am not going to object to that paragraph in the present instance, because I understand that in this instance there is nothing among the papers that could do any harm to anyone if it came to the Senate in open session; but I do wish to say that I shall object, so far as post-office matters are concerned, or in behalf of any committee of which I am a member, to having brought into the open Senate papers that may be in the department with reference to a nomination. I believe it is the safer and better plan to let them go to the committee and come to the executive session from the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Georgia, and I can assure him that I shall not ask that anything which seems improper shall be brought to the Senate. But this is a matter which has already been made public in the press. It has challenged the attention of the Senate and a portion of the country. It has already been given wide publicity. The Senate should have full information on the subject. The Postmaster General can furnish information, and I am informed has expressed a willingness to do so. Why not let the country know the facts? Irrespective of the question as to whether a man is to be confirmed as postmaster who had entered into a bargain for it or not, the transaction published by the parties should be considered by the Senate. That is the object which the Senator from Ohio had in view. I agree with the Senator from Georgia that a matter which properly belongs to executive session should not be brought into open session, but this transaction should be discussed with open doors.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say that as far as I am concerned I will be very much better satisfied to vote for his confirmation if he is going to run a straight Democratic paper than if he was going to run any other kind. I think it shows that he is going to render his country a service.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I would just like to ask the Senator from Michigan if he does not think, in spite of the fact that this is a matter which has been made public, that this is establishing even in this instance rather a dangerous precedent? If it is to go abroad that whenever there is any question raised and it gets into the public press, the charges will be investigated in open Senate, we would invite the very thing that we wish to avoid.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I had supposed that up until the present session of Congress, at least, publicity was the thing Democrats were demanding. If there is anything in the charge that this is a species of bribery—and if it is not within the letter it is certainly within the spirit of the prohibitions of the corrupt practices act—no Senator on this floor can afford to withhold all the facts connected with it or to hide them in the secrecy of executive session. If there is anything which can come before the Senate in open session to shed any light on a question of this importance, it ought not to be excluded or suppressed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will permit me, I was not making any plea for the suppression of any of the facts, but my object was simply to expedite the business of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which is charged with the duty of ascertaining all the facts and not suppressing them. I do not want the intimation to go out here from the members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads or otherwise that I made the suggestion for the purpose of suppressing anything in connection with this matter. It was simply to avoid a precedent from being established that might relieve the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads from duty and resolve the Senate into a Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it will have that effect.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It seems to me that this will forestall the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and prevent that committee from ascertaining the facts while giving them first to the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to say to the Senator there will be no expedition secured by withholding the consideration of this resolution to-day.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me, if the Senator from Michigan earnestly desired to prevent this confirmation, thus saving the country from the services of this postmaster, he would not advertise something for political effect, but he would have pursued the ordinary course of opposing the confirmation in the Senate. The ordinary course on all confirmations is to have the appointment referred to a committee; and if there are charges against the appointee, they are then sent to the committee for investigation, and the committee investigates them and takes evidence. Then it is reported to an executive session of the Senate.

What surprises me is that if this is an earnest effort and a patriotic desire to prevent the confirmation of this appointee, the usual course was not pursued. It could have been very easily requested that this information should be sent to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of which the Senator is a member. The Senator who has charge of the appointments from Ohio could have been notified of these conditions, and he could have requested the committee to summon witnesses, and he could have obtained a statement from the Postmaster General. It is amazing that this case should be isolated from all others if the purpose was one entirely patriotic.

The editorial was read, and it seems to me, from the patriotic purposes first announced by the Senator from Michigan, he has pursued a very unusual course in connection with this appointment. The fact that he did that has created an impression that he desires publicity more than the usual course of fighting appointments of this character sent to the Senate. If the Senator wishes to fight this confirmation, he could very easily have gone to the Senator to whom the Ohio cases are referred; the matter could have been presented to that Senator; and if that Senator had not concluded that it was a proper appointment he would report it adversely, he would refer it back to the entire committee, and the entire committee would have investigated it. The entire committee could have gotten all the papers from the Postmaster General and summoned anyone to come and testify, and the matter would have been brought up in executive session. That is what the Senate for more than a century has determined to be the wise, proper, and just course in considering nominations, and I am surprised that this case should have been isolated from all others.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is the subcommitteeman for the State of Ohio. This nomination was referred to the Senators from Ohio according to the rule. The senior Senator from Ohio introduced the resolution that is now before the Senate. It is his resolution and not mine. I have taken it up in his absence, but on his request. I am sorry he is unavoidably absent. He saw fit to bring this matter before the Senate through this resolution, and he has presented it in due form. He has received the consent of the Senate to consider it. It went over a day for the purpose of giving it consideration. It seemed to him, as it does to me, it is such a serious thing, that justice to all parties requires it should be disclosed in the open session of Congress, not only for the benefit of the Senate but for the edification of the country and for the good of the parties directly involved.

If there is nothing wrong about this contract, if it is not a violation of any law or of moral ethics, it certainly will stand the test of a thorough investigation, or, at least, of a report of the facts by the Postmaster General. This resolution calls only for facts, and you ought not to suppress them.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Ohio could easily have trusted the Senator from Michigan, who is charged with reporting upon this case from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and it is surprising to me that the Senator from Ohio and the Senator who has charge of the Ohio cases violated the usual procedure in such cases, and without reporting back to the full committee, without making an investigation, comes with this matter in the open session of the Senate.

It seems to me the proper course for the Senator from Michigan to have pursued in this case, as he has charge of the Ohio matters, if both Senators did not consent to the confirmation under the rules adopted, would have been to report back to the full committee the fact of this difference. Then the full committee could have had an investigation of its own, could have summoned witnesses, could have summoned everybody interested, and gotten all the papers. What is surprising to me is that this course was not pursued if the purpose is so patriotic as intimated by the Senator from Michigan.

I think the Senator from Michigan himself should have reported this case back to the full committee and let the usual course be pursued. Is there to be a precedent established that every time anyone wishes to say anything against an appointment sent in here a resolution is to be brought up and is to be discussed in open session of the Senate and not in executive session?

There is no desire to suppress anything. I wish to say that the Postmaster General himself did not object to furnishing this information, but what I desire to protest against is that the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Michigan should change the entire course of such appointments and not follow the usual procedure. I think it was incumbent to do so if their purpose was to prevent an unfit man from being postmaster.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I can not, of course, state what was in the mind of the Senator from Ohio, but I can readily believe that this is a resolution which should be considered in the Senate without regard to the confirmation of the man named for postmaster at Salem, Ohio. Consideration of confirmation will come after investigation. I know of no reason why the course suggested by the junior Senator from Virginia can not and will not be followed. But this is a matter that has already been made public. It has attained newspaper notoriety. The two parties have written the record; they have furnished such information as we have, and not the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Michigan.

I repeat, as far as the confirmation of this candidate for the post office at Salem is concerned, that can be handled without regard to this resolution and in executive session, if Senators wish, but the distinguished Senator from Ohio believes, as do I, that the case is bigger than simply the question as to whether a particular man shall be postmaster or not; it may involve legal or moral wrong, and this resolution will disclose the facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this resolution is pure political byplay of the peanut variety. Its hypocrisy is sublime, coming from the Republican Party, which for 53 years has been rewarding past, present, and hoped-for political service with post offices.

There is nothing secret here. Here is a man's own newspaper publishing the two letters. Information is not sought, because the information is there. It is, however, sought to make the impression that something remarkably unusual has been done with regard to the Salem post office. It is not even true that the man was to publish a Democratic newspaper. That is not where the gaff struck and hurt. The gaff struck and hurt when the Congressman said that it was to be a genuine Democratic newspaper, devoted to putting the gangsters of both political parties out.

It is a pity you can not put somebody into every post office in the United States with some power and some will to set to the work of putting out the gangsters of both political parties. If the objection to this man is that it is feared that he may devote his newspaper to that purpose, it strikes me that the objection is not well taken. This may be a part of the organized effort on the other side of the Chamber to take up the time of the Senate with all sorts of little things, and to thereby delay the greater things which in the course of time must come. I do not know.

This resolution reads:

> 2. To investigate and inform the Senate whether such postmaster was recommended under an agreement that, if appointed, he would, as a condition of such appointment, publish a Democratic newspaper.

There are two letters showing that the office was offered upon the condition that if the editor would publish a genuine Democratic newspaper, try to get the gangsters of both parties out, and devote himself to the cause of honest politics, the Congressman would name him. There is no secrecy about it; it was published in the paper. The editor was proud of the fact that he gave the assurance, and he had a right to be proud of the fact that he gave the assurance, and we have a right over here on this side of the Chamber to be proud of the fact that a Democratic Congressman was seeking that sort of a man who would do that sort of work.

It is not at all strange that the "galled jade" should wince. I do not suppose there has been a time in the political history of the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Michigan since they have been here when they ever objected to a man being made postmaster because he had done or said he was going to do political work for the Republican Party. I do not suppose either one of them ever in his life recommended a Democrat for a post office. I rather guess, though I do not know, that both of them at times have recommended editors to be postmasters. Upon that question I await further light upon some other occasion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi what sort of a newspaper this man intends to run if he does not get the appointment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That I can not tell you; but if there is any assurance that he will run this sort of a newspaper, he will perform a great service for the American people. I take it that he was already running a Democratic newspaper, and I take it that, if he was running a genuine Democratic newspaper, he was already doing good; but it seems that the Congressman wanted further assurance, and he got it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Mississippi says, if he will permit me——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One minute, and I will.

The whole gravamen of it is that you are hypocritically complaining that a man is appointed to a postmastership because he has done or will do party service, when you have been appointing such men for the past 53 years for those reasons.

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. TOWNSEND addressed the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi says, as I understand, that this man has promised, if he receives this appointment as postmaster, that he will hereafter run a genuine Democratic newspaper and put the gangsters out of business. What I should like to know from the Senator from Mississippi is if the man is not appointed postmaster whether he intends to run an anti-Democratic newspaper and keep the gangsters in?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the question which I answered before, the question to which I returned the reply; that is certainly a truism that I did not know. I should like to know how I could know. If the Senator from Utah will tell me how I could know, I may go about ascertaining the information he desires; but so long as I see no roadway to travel I can not undertake to tell him what the end of the road is.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will in a second. I want to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. The Senator from Utah asked me if this was a promise to carry on that sort of a newspaper. The letter was read, and I suppose the Senator from Utah heard it. I will again quote the language:

> Without entering into any discussion, if Mr. Gee, the editor of the Herald, will agree to run a genuinely Democratic newspaper and will help to put the "gangsters" in both parties out of business, I think he should get the post office.

That is a letter written to somebody else—I do not see to whom—by the Representative; but it was written to somebody else and not to Mr. Gee. Mr. Gee makes this answer:

> Your communication of the 28th—

It seems that the Representative wrote to offer Mr. Gee the office—> received, and your proffer of the postmastership in Salem is accepted, together with the conditions imposed—

That is, to run a genuine Democratic newspaper, with every possible effort to put the gangsters out. The Senator is just as good a judge as I am of whether or not that is a promise or the acceptance of a condition, or what not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that if he does not know about it, and neither do I, and perhaps nobody else here, it might be well to investigate it and see what sort of a newspaper this man has been running in the past.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Investigate what sort of a newspaper he would run if he did not run the sort it was thought he was going to run? If that is what you want the investigation for, it strikes me as rather absurd.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; it might be well to ascertain what sort of a newspaper he has been running in the past to see how much influence this proposition had upon him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator reminds me of a story I once heard. A little girl cried to her mother, and her mother was excited. She said to her mother, "Come here quick, mamma." Mamma went, and thought the little girl was hurt. When she got there she said, "My child, what is the matter?" The child said, "Nothing now, mamma; but I thought that chicken was dead." The chicken had been lying on its back cooling off in the hot time of the day. "I thought that chicken was dead, and, mamma, if it had been dead I wonder who killed it." [Laughter.]

I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, has it occurred to the Senator that this is a case where, in order to obtain men who will put the gangsters out, you have to buy them? There is clearly an inference in that article that——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; there is not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That this man must be induced, through the promise of a position, before he will do this good thing. The Senator suggested another thing, namely, that I have been in the habit, or have been in the business, of putting Republicans in office, which is true; and I am not complaining in any single instance because Democrats put Democrats into office where vacancies occur. It is not true, however, that I have never recommended a Democrat for office, because I have done so several times.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say "for office." Did the Senator ever recommend one for a post office?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have recommended Democrats for post offices.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where there was a Republican in the precinct of respectable character?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, yes. I live in a Republican State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because if you ever did it when there was a Republican in the precinct of respectable character, knowing you and honoring you as I do as a pretty stalwart partisan, the information surprises me.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is nevertheless true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, I do not think anybody has any doubt about the purpose of this resolution. It is purely political; it is purely for the purpose of trying to arouse distrust and enmity toward the President and his administration, and therefore, believing that, I move to lay resolution No. 94 on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I second the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Pennsylvania has not voted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 19.

TARIFF ON SUGAR.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President and Senators, there has been so much agitation recently about the tariff on sugar, so much misconception, and so many erroneous ideas concerning sugar that I feel it my duty to trespass on the time of the Senate this afternoon to explain one or two phases of this very important subject. It is so complicated that I shall not attempt to go into it fully at this time, leaving that for some future occasion.

In view of the recent strictures of the President about lobbies, I beg to say that I know of nothing improper which has been done by friends of the rice and sugar producers of Louisiana, or of any other items in the pending tariff bill, and I am delighted that a Senate committee is conducting a searching inquiry into all kinds of lobbies. If there has been anything corrupt, I sincerely hope the offenders will be discovered and severely punished. No man has a greater contempt for anyone who tries by illicit means to influence legislation, but, on the other hand, I recognize the sacred right of citizens to petition the lawmaker, to make their views known, and to urge in respectful arguments their ideas of proposed legislation affecting their interests. While I am not aware of anything wrong in the conduct of the sugar producers I strongly suspect that the sugar refiners have done much to mold public opinion favorable to free sugar or a very great reduction in duty in order to greatly increase their selfish profits. Certainly one of the largest refiners has conducted such a campaign at great cost.

To-day I wish to lay down the following propositions, which I shall endeavor to prove:

First. The Sugar Trust and most of the big refiners of sugar were for years criminals of "unparalleled depravity," to quote the language of ex-Attorney General Wickersham. Two of their most prominent officials and a number of their employees were convicted of frauds and sentenced to the penitentiary. Moreover, they have been forced to disgorge and pay to the United States Treasury $4,358,575.88 growing out of these frauds, which they are now seeking to recoup by lowering the duty on their raw material, thus enabling them to make the greater profits.

Second. The supposed or real sentiment in favor of free sugar or a great reduction in the duties thereon is mainly due to the efforts of the refiners of sugar, especially the Federal Sugar Refining Co. and its sales agent, Frank C. Lowry. The people care little about the duty, as sugar is already the cheapest article of human food. (See Appendix A.) The refiners conducted the campaign in order to distract attention from themselves, and to profit by any sugar legislation they might bring about.

Third. The refiners would reap the principal benefit from free sugar or a big reduction in duty. (See Appendix B.) Prices of this article are kept low by active competition of the rapidly growing beet-sugar industry, and also by the cane sugar of Louisiana. If the production of cane in Louisiana be destroyed, as would unquestionably result from free sugar, and the production of beet sugar be very much curtailed, if not entirely ruined, the refiners would get complete control of the market, and after a brief period of three or four years, under free sugar, would raise prices as high or higher than now. The Government would lose $52,000,000 a year in revenue, and the people would get no cheaper sugar, except for the few years necessary to ruin the domestic producers, after which the trust and the other refiners would pocket immense profits.

Fourth. The refiners are a small band of men. There are only seven important refining companies in the Union, three of which do nearly 90 per cent of the business, and all of which give employment to about 10,000 people. The cane-sugar industry of Louisiana supports half a million souls. The beet-sugar industry employs fully 150,000 people, and 500,000 are dependent upon it. In Porto Rico 700,000 people get their living from sugar. In Hawaii nearly the entire population of 200,000 souls depend on sugar. Sugar refining is a mere cleansing or washing process. The entire cost of handling a ton of imported sugar is about $6.75, while the growth of cane and beets is the work of farmers and its manufacture into sugar the labor of American citizens, each ton requiring an outlay to farmers and factory labor of about $75. Thus to refine 2,500,000 tons of imported raw sugar which was produced abroad employs labor and supplies to the extent of less than $17,000,000, while to produce a like amount of sugar at home would distribute $187,000,000 to American citizens. This combined business of the farm and factory maintains in the cultivation of cane and beets and the manufacture thereof into sugar about 2,000,000 people in every walk of life, the vast majority of whom are farmers and laborers engaged in an entirely legitimate business. This large number of citizens—farmers, manufacturers, merchants, lawyers, doctors, artisans, laborers, mechanics of every kind and sort—have no connection with the Sugar Trust or the refining interests. It is true that the trust owns stock in several of the beet-sugar refineries, having purchased it with the idea of controlling the beet industry, and failing therein, is disposing of it as rapidly as possible.

Fifth. If the tariff bill provides free sugar or such a rate as will destroy the domestic competition, the Democratic Party will be playing into the hands of the Sugar Trust and other refiners. Moreover, it will violate the pledge of the Baltimore platform not to destroy a legitimate industry. It is no time to quibble and attempt to evade by specious arguments those words, "We recognize that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry," which, according to my information, were written into the platform with especial reference to sugar.

FALSE SENTIMENT FOR FREE SUGAR DUE TO REFINERS.

The fight that is now being waged by the refining interests is, in many respects, analogous to the tactics they used 12 years ago to secure a reciprocity treaty with Cuba.

Prior to the Spanish-American War they were principally concerned with maintaining a high preferential rate of duty between raw and refined sugars, but when the fortunes of war opened up Cuba and other tropical islands for American exploitation the refiners proceeded to acquire immense holdings in these new countries and to scheme for the entry of their raw sugar into the American market. While Cuba did not come under the American flag it was the principal object of their attention, and knowing they could appeal to the generosity of the American people they began to publish the most harrowing tales of distress in Cuba. By means of an immense publicity fund they were enabled to create a sentiment among our people for the islanders which resulted in the ratification of the Cuban reciprocity treaty.

The hand of the refiners did not show until the deed was accomplished, for the literature was put out anonymously, and also under the name of the "American Export Association." They are reputed to have expended something more than a million dollars in this work in one year; but they succeeded, and they not only checked the growth of the domestic cane and beet-sugar industries, but they transferred millions of dollars yearly from Uncle Sam's Treasury to their own.

Meanwhile, the domestic-sugar industry recovered from the shock and again proceeded to forge ahead. This required attention, as every additional ton of sugar produced from American-grown cane and beets means one less ton of foreign sugar to be imported and handled by the seaboard refiners.

Satisfied with their former success, the refiners began to agitate the sugar tariff, and by one of them a literary bureau was organized to educate the people to believe that of all things most needed to reduce the cost of living it was cheaper sugar, the one food product which now sells for less money than it did 15 years ago—sugar, the cheapest article of human food.

The new organization was not called "The Committee of New York Refiners." The reputation of these gentlemen was too malodorous for that. It was known that should the refiners ask for a reduction of duty the public would feel inclined to increase it. So, instead of being called "The Committee of New York Sugar Refiners," it was called "The Committee of Wholesale Grocers, Formed to Assist in Obtaining Cheaper Sugars for Consumers Through the Reduction of Duties on Raw and Refined Sugars." The name adopted obviously was for the reason that it readily would be confused with that of the Wholesale Grocers' Association, than which no organization in the United States stands higher or is more free from bias.

COUNTRY FLOODED WITH FALSE INFORMATION—SAVING TO THE CONSUMER NEGLIGIBLE.

Concealing their identity behind this cloak of eminent respectability, the "committee" proceeded to flood the country with literature and misinform the public. They stated that the duty on sugar was eight times as high as upon diamonds and four times as high as upon automobiles, both of which statements were false. They stated that if the duty were removed from sugar the price would be cheaper by 2 cents per pound, whereas the entire duty on the sugar we import from Cuba, which furnishes practically all our foreign sugar, is but 1½ cents per pound. They stated that if the duty were eliminated the saving to the American people would be $8 per annum per family, whereas with sugar free the total possible net saving could not exceed 72 cents per capita per annum, even if the price of sugar were reduced the full amount of the duty, which experience shows will not be the case.

But assuming the maximum reduction, which is admitted only arguendo, what is the result? The average annual amount of sugar consumed is 80 pounds. Of this, 26 pounds is used in manufactures, such as condensed milk, chewing gum, soda water, and so forth, which will certainly be no cheaper. This leaves 54 pounds for ordinary uses of sugar, which, at 1½ cents, gives the total reduction of 72 cents, or approximately $65,000,000 on our present population of 90,000,000. From this deduct $52,000,000 customs revenue which the people must pay either in this way or some other way, and we have remaining only $13,000,000 annual expense by reason of the sugar duty—not $115,000,000, as has been persistently stated.

Through the press, through circulars, through pamphlets, "the committee" tried to create the impression that free sugar is demanded imperatively, not only by a vast proportion of the American people but by the multitude of firms who use sugar in their products. They put men on the road to solicit people to sign petitions praying for a reduction of the duty on sugar, and the public, believing the statements of the "Wholesale Grocers" to be true and thinking that free sugar would save each family $8 a year and at the same time injure no one but the refiners, in whom they had no faith, signed and sent in to their Congressmen and Senators little yellow petitions prepared and furnished them gratis by this benevolent committee.

INSIDIOUS CAMPAIGN OF REFINERS.

Concerning this misleading literary bureau much information was drawn from its secretary, Frank C. Lowry, none other than the sales agent of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., while he was on the witness stand July 13, 1911, during the Hardwick hearings, page 1607. (See Appendix B.)

Under cross-questioning this friend of the consuming masses admitted that the so-called "committee" never was appointed by any wholesale grocers, never was organized, never held a meeting of any character or description, never elected an officer, never suggested a move or directed the work, and that no one ever applied for membership. He testified, furthermore, that the wholesale grocers of this country never contributed one cent to carry on the propaganda which has been so energetically and insidiously conducted under their name for the past four years, but that all of the expense of the costly campaign had been defrayed by the Federal Sugar Refining Co. This concern is now being sued by the National Government to recover $119,000 for alleged sugar frauds, and yet it would have the public believe that the money it expended for the alleged wholesale grocers' campaign was expended for a pure and altruistic purpose.

Now, who are these refiners who are so anxious to secure a reduction of the duty on raw sugar? One of them, at any rate, openly acknowledged spending money lavishly to accomplish that purpose, and others may be doing the same thing in secret, while leading the public to believe that it is the wholesale grocers of the country and not the seaboard refiners who are working to this end. What are their antecedents? What is their reputation for veracity, for probity, for fair dealing with the Government? Is their record clean? Are they in good repute? Are they to be believed when they tell you that they are public benefactors; that they are working solely in the interest of the American people?

The refining combine consists of a very small, compact, homogeneous body of men who operate from a common center—New York. It consists of but three concerns—the American Sugar Refining Co., commonly known as the Sugar Trust; Arbuckle Bros.; and the Federal Sugar Refining Co., of which Claus A. Spreckels is the head and Frank C. Lowry, of "Wholesale Grocer" fame, is the sales agent. Eighty-eight per cent of all the sugar refined in the United States is refined by these three concerns, which seemingly act in perfect harmony, not only in fixing the price they will pay for raw sugar but the price they will charge the public for refined. They usually sell at the same price or at a variance which is limited to a few cents per hundred pounds. This combine refines 2,500,000 tons of sugar a year, leaving less than 300,000 tons which is refined by the other small refiners. If the refiners could so manipulate the duty on sugar as to pass along a small portion of it to the consumer and retain for themselves a matter of a half a cent a pound, $25,000,000 a year would be added to the net profits of this little group of philanthropists which is urging Congress to place sugar on the free list or make a radical reduction in the duty. This vast sum is represented by the difference between sugar selling at 18 pounds and at 20 pounds for a dollar.

HOW REFINERS ROBBED THE GOVERNMENT.

Let us examine briefly some of the past dealings between the Government and these refiners as disclosed by the official reports of the Attorney General of the United States.

In his report for 1909, page 11, in discussing "Frauds upon the revenue," the Attorney General says:

An investigation was undertaken in 1907 into certain alleged frauds upon the Government in the underweighing of sugars imported into the United States by the American Sugar Refining Co. and its predecessors, Messrs. Havemeyer & Elder. This investigation resulted, among other things, in a suit by the United States against the American Sugar Refining Co. and the recovery of a judgment against it in the District Court for the Southern District of New York in the sum of $134,411.03, based upon proof of systematic frauds practiced in the weighing of sugars on the docks of the Havemeyer & Elder refineries in Brooklyn, N. Y., between the years 1901 and 1907.

The evidence in the suit above referred to revealed a long-continued system of defrauding the Government of unparalleled depravity. Following the judgment above mentioned the defendant opened negotiations which resulted, in the latter part of April, 1909, in the making of a compromise whereby the company paid to the Government the amount of the above-mentioned judgment of $134,411.03 and in addition the sum of $2,000,000 on account of duties fraudulently withheld by it from the Government on account of short weighing of sugar. * * * I believe it is the largest individual recovery ever secured by the Government on a claim of this nature.

In his report for the year following, 1910, the Attorney General says (p. 12):

Since the date of my (last) report, investigation into the books of the five large sugar-refining companies engaged in business in the port of New York, viz, the American Sugar Refining Co., Messrs. Arbuckle Bros. (a partnership), the National Sugar Refining Co., the Federal Sugar Refining Co., and the Warner Sugar Refining Co., has been continued and completed, and the following amounts have been collected in addition to those paid by the American Sugar Refining Co.; Arbuckle Bros., back duties repaid December 4, 1909, without prejudice to right to criminal prosecution, $695,573.19; National Sugar Refining Co., back duties repaid February 7, 1910, without prejudice to right to criminal prosecution, $604,304.37; making, with the amounts collected from the American Sugar Refining Co. as above, $3,135,363.88.

Investigation into importations by the Federal Sugar Refining Co. is still pending. No fraud was discovered on the part of the Warner Sugar Refining Co.

In his report for the year following, 1911, the Attorney General says (p. 20):

The vigorous enforcement of the customs laws has been continued throughout the year in cooperation with the Treasury Department. The history of the frauds in the underweighing of sugar importations was carried in my last annual report up to the conviction of the highest guilty officers of the American Sugar Refining Co.—Heike, the secretary and treasurer, and Gerbach, the general manager of the Brooklyn refinery. * * * During the weighing investigation illegalities were discovered in the drawbacks of the American Sugar Refining Co., by which the company had for many years claimed and received drawbacks on exported sirups which, in fact, had been manufactured in whole or in part out of free and not dutiable sugars. A test case was brought claiming $350,000 on account of such drawbacks, but it was settled by the payment of the sum of $700,000, covering the claims made in the suit as well as other similar claims asserted by the Government.

In his last annual report, covering the operations of the Department of Justice for the year 1912, the Attorney General again finds it necessary to recount the steps taken by the Government during the preceding year to punish these habitual criminals. On page 36 he says:

A thorough investigation which I have conducted into the importations of sugar at the port of Philadelphia, covering the period of 17 years subsequent to the reimposition of the duty on raw sugar by the Wilson Act of August, 1894, has disclosed short weighings and illegal collections of drawbacks. In settlement of these claims the Government has collected nearly a quarter of a million dollars, made up of $100,000 from the W. J. McCahan Sugar Refining Co. and $124,386.29 from the Franklin Sugar Refining Co., on behalf of itself and the Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. * * * The only cases remaining pending undetermined based on frauds resulting from fraudulent weighing or sampling of imported merchandise are:

1. A claim against the American Sugar Refining Co. for fraudulent sampling at the port of New Orleans. In this case the entries involved are now being reliquidated by the collector of the port, but have not yet been transmitted by him to the United States attorney for collection.

2. A claim against the Federal Sugar Refining Co. at New York for underweighing imported sugars. These entries have been reliquidated by the collector, payment demanded of the company and refused, and a suit to enforce collection of $119,080.98 as unpaid duties has been recently brought in the District Court, Southern District of New York.

The Franklin, McCahan, and National Refineries are subsidiaries of the trust.

In addition to the civil recoveries, a number of criminal prosecutions were conducted. Heike and Gerbach, two of the highest officials of the American Sugar Trust, were convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary, and eight employees, who manipulated the secret devices by which the frauds were accomplished, acting directly under instructions from their superiors, were also convicted and sentenced to the Federal penitentiary.

These investigations and prosecutions disclosed one of the saddest and vilest stories of crime in the annals of our Republic.

So much for the malodorous reputation of these men, as shown by the official records of the Department of Justice.

MILLIONS THE PRIZE.

Now, let us try to fathom their motives for their tariff campaign. We will begin with the firm of Arbuckle Bros., which perhaps has made the strongest claims of any of them to being a philanthropist and a public benefactor. Some years ago Arbuckle's philanthropic instincts led him to advocate "free coffee" for the poor man's breakfast table, and Congress finally was induced to place coffee on the free list. A few years ago Arbuckle became the prime mover in forming a coffee trust, which included the Brazilian exporters, and the price of coffee, instead of declining, went soaring, thanks to the philanthropy of Mr. Arbuckle.

I took occasion to discuss the effect of free trade upon the price of coffee when the sugar schedule was under consideration in the House March 15 last year, when I pointed out that from 1865 to 1870 coffee paid a duty of 5 cents per pound, when it was reduced to 3 cents, and in May, 1872, it was placed on the free list, where it has since remained. The wholesale prices of coffee on the New York market have been as follows: For the seven years, 1865 to 1871, inclusive, 19.33, 17.19, 16.14, 10.62, 9.31, 10, and 12.81 cents per pound, respectively, an average price of 13.34 cents. During the first five years of this period the duty was 5 cents a pound and for the other two it was 3 cents. There were big promises of a cheap breakfast table when the act of 1872 placing coffee on the free list was passed, but we find, on the contrary, the following range of prices for coffee for the next seven years—1873 to 1879, inclusive—18.37, 21.25, 18.06, 17.38, 19.44, 16.38, and 14.31, respectively, being an average for the first seven years under free coffee of 17.88 cents per pound as compared with 13.34 cents during the preceding period, or 4.54 cents per pound higher under free trade than before the duty was removed. During the 10 years 1887 to 1896 the price of coffee was 17.85 cents—not much cheap breakfast table in that. So much for the house of Arbuckle.

The other philanthropists who are urging free sugar "for the people," or a great reduction in duty, have no record in the coffee world worth mentioning, but, including Arbuckle, as I have already pointed out, all of them except the Warner Co. have the sugar record which the Department of Justice deemed worthy of close attention.

These are the interests that are principally responsible for the cry that has been set up for free sugar.

REFINERS DROP MASK.

Their hand was plainly shown when hearings on the sugar schedule of the pending bill were had before the Ways and Means Committee on January 15 last. Twenty-one witnesses were heard on that occasion, and of these 15 were sugar farmers, representatives of commercial organizations, and others who protested against a reduction being made in the rate of duty.

And whose testimony will you find asking for a reduction of the duty on sugar "in the interest of the people"? One was a representative of a canning concern, who desired cheaper raw material, but extended no assurance that his product would be sold any cheaper if he got it.

And who were the other four? No less personages than the representatives of the three great New York refining interests who have been caught red-handed in their unsavory dealings with the Government and have been made to disgorge a portion, at least, of the amounts they wrongfully extracted from its coffers. No one else appearing to advocate their cause, they had to throw off the cloak and plead their own case or allow it to go by default.

Edwin F. Atkins, vice president of the American Sugar Refining Co., otherwise known as the Sugar Trust, which handed back approximately $3,000,000 in order to induce the United States Government to withdraw its suit for moneys wrongfully taken from the Government, did not plead for as severe a castigation as did some of the rest of the philanthropists. He did not ask for absolutely free sugar, for that would destroy the preferential with Cuba and perhaps result in the New York refiners having to pay the world price for their raw material. Mr. Atkins would be satisfied if enough of the duty were eliminated to prevent the expansion of the domestic cane and beet sugar industry.

His testimony elucidated the reason why the Sugar Trust expended such enormous amounts in its successful efforts to bring about Cuban reciprocity 10 years ago. He said:

> The interest of the sugar refiners in this country and the producers in Cuba are identical. The sugar refiners can buy their sugar in Cuba as long as the sugar gets the preferential.

In previous testimony Mr. Atkins had admitted that the New York refiners and not the Cuban producers absorbed this 34.8 cents tariff reduction on Cuban sugar.

Harking back to the days of Cuban reciprocity agitation, it will be remembered that at that time Mr. Atkins appeared as a Cuban planter, the owner of the Trinidad sugar estate. He was connected with the Sugar Trust at the time, but minimized his interest in it. Asked if Mr. Havemeyer did not own a large interest in the Trinidad estate which he, Atkins, professed to own, he replied:

> It is a very moderate interest, and not sufficient to exercise control over that one property.

On May 1 of the same year Mr. Havemeyer was before the Senate Committee on Relations with Cuba, and, being asked about his ownership in Mr. Atkins's Trinidad estate, he frankly stated that he owned 40 per cent of it; that his lifelong partner, Mr. C. H. Senff, vice president of the Sugar Trust, owned 40 per cent, and that Atkins owned the remaining 20 per cent. (See hearings, p. 11.) Mr. Atkins appears to be a somewhat forgetful witness.

Following Mr. Atkins in pleading for cheaper sugar before the Ways and Means Committee came Mr. James H. Post, president of the National Sugar Refining Co., owned by the trust, which handed over its check to the Government for $604,304 to avoid prosecution.

Then came Mr. William A. Jamison, head of the philanthropic house of Arbuckle Bros., which settled with the Government by handing over $695,573, pleading for free sugar for the benefit of the dear consumer. This is the branch of the refiners' combine which so dearly loves the consumer that in September, 1911, while paying no more for raw sugar, ran the wholesale price of refined up to 7½ cents a pound, or one-quarter of a cent a pound higher than did the other refiners and a cent a pound higher than domestic beet sugar was selling for at the same time. At the hearings, however, Mr. Jamison was very solicitous for the consumer and favored free trade in sugar, just as there is in coffee.

Then came Mr. Frank C. Lowry, secretary of the mythical "Wholesale Grocers" and sales agent of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., against which the Federal Government brought suit for $119,080 for money alleged to have been taken unlawfully from Uncle Sam by means of false methods of weighing, which are stated by the United States district attorney to have been in vogue from the opening of the refinery in 1902 until 1909, when secret-service men made their investigation and discovered the fraud. Mr. Lowry urged the committee, if it was unable to place sugar on the free list, that it adopt the rates he had previously urged on the Finance Committee of 62 cents per 100 pounds on refined sugar and 60 cents on raw sugar testing 96°.

Lowry would have the public believe he is urging free sugar in order to "hit the trust," but it is significant that although the head of the trust and the head of Arbuckle Bros. were in the committee room, the allotment of the time before the committee was accorded to their publicity manager, Lowry; the trust officials and Arbuckle were satisfied to file or make brief statements and to have Lowry plead their case for several hours.

Is it to be believed that the head of a $90,000,000 corporation and the head of the second largest refining interest would sit surrounded by minor officers and meekly allow a real competitor to monopolize all their time and to misrepresent them, to misstate their position before the great committee which had the fate of their industry in its hands?

It should be plain that the refiners want the duty eliminated in order that thereby they will be given the power to crush the home cane and beet sugar industry, their only competitor. Having done that, and thereby having gained a complete monopoly of a necessity for which the American people expend $400,000,000 a year, would their natural tendency be to lower or to raise the price of sugar? If their purpose is to lower the price after they have complete mastery of the field, then we all have been mistaken concerning the object and purpose of monopoly.

HAVING TRICKED REPUBLICANS, REFINERS WOULD NOW TRICK DEMOCRATS.

Ten years ago the refiners tricked the people and the Republican Party on Cuban reciprocity, through the enactment of which measure tens of millions of dollars have been transferred from the Treasury of the United States to the treasuries of the refiners. Not satisfied with this legalized trickery and the resultant millions, they defrauded the people for years with false weights and in an illegal manner took from them other millions, a portion of which they have been compelled to return. They are now trying to trick the Democratic Party into giving them free sugar. It seems significant that no sooner had the Government discovered and halted their false weighing methods than was organized the "Wholesale Grocers'" literary bureau, which inaugurated at great cost, under a name intended to deceive the public, a campaign for free sugar. It looks as though finding themselves cut off from one source of income they decided to recoup themselves in another way, less dangerous but equally effective. This time they would deceive the people and the Democratic Party, deplete the people's Treasury of $52,000,000 a year revenue derived from the sugar duty, absorb a portion or all of it, and at the same time ruin domestic competition, which, when fully developed, will contribute more wealth to the Nation in one year than would the refiners in a century.

WHAT HAPPENED BEFORE UNDER FREE SUGAR?

Let us learn a lesson from history as to what may happen under free sugar or a low duty. In October, 1890, sugar was placed on the free list; in August, 1894, it was restored to the dutiable list at the rate of 40 per cent ad valorem; and finally in August, 1897, was again given protection. During this seven-year period of free and 40 per cent ad valorem duty, our refiners melted approximately 15,000,000 tons of sugar. The difference which they maintained in 1890 between the price of raw and the price of refined was 70 cents per 100 pounds, but immediately sugar was placed on the free list this difference began to increase, finally reaching the maximum of $1.15 per hundred in 1893, the last full year of free sugar. The average difference maintained during the seven years of free sugar and 40 per cent ad valorem was 93 cents per 100 pounds, or 23 cents per 100 pounds in excess of what it was in 1890. In other words, 23 cents per 100 pounds of the remission of duty was pocketed by the refiners. On their meltings of 16,000,000 tons, this 23 cents per 100 pounds amounted to $73,000,000, which represents the portion of the tariff reduction which was absorbed by the refiners instead of being passed along to the people. To-day the three great refining interests, which are working for a reduced duty on or for free sugar, refine 2,250,000 tons of sugar annually, and if, through a reduction of the tariff, they again secure the ability to increase their margin between raw and refined sugar 23 cents per 100 pounds, it will mean an added net profit of $11,500,000 a year.

HOW LOUISIANA IS AFFECTED.

I am especially interested in the cane-sugar producers of Louisiana, who have suffered no less from the oppression of these refining interests than the Federal Treasury has suffered from their frauds.

Through their hypocritical campaign for free sugar they have induced many people to believe that the Louisiana sugar producers are in league with the refiners. Testimony, however, was introduced in the suit of the Government against the American Sugar Refining Co., during the trial in New Orleans last December, which should forever put at rest the false impression existing in many quarters that the Louisiana sugar planters are in any manner allied with the trust. It was established that two well organized and directed efforts of the planters to establish a refinery of their own in New Orleans were defeated through the misrepresentations and treachery of the tools of the American Sugar Refining Co.

The feeling these refiners entertain toward my people is told in their own language in letters found by the Government when it took over the files of the Sugar Trust at the time suit was instituted to dissolve that corporation under the Sherman anti-trust law.

For example, here is an extract from the letter of J. T. Witherspoon, manager of the New Orleans plant of the American Sugar Refining Co., to H. C. Mott, the buyer of raw sugar for that company:

NEW ORLEANS, October 27, 1904.

Mr. H. C. MOTT, No. 117 Wall Street, New York.

DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

Commencing with the latter part of next week the daily arrivals here on account of contracts already made will be large. These contracts, as you know, will be settled at a differential under the New York price day of arrival. Hence it behooves you to depress the New York markets as much as possible, for the lower the New York quotation is the less these sugars will cost us.

Yours, very truly, J. T. WITHERSPOON.

Here is another extract from a letter of Witherspoon to President Thomas, of the trust, which was introduced by the Government in the suit last December:

NEW ORLEANS, October 28, 1908.

Mr. W. B. THOMAS,
President the American Sugar Refining Co., New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. THOMAS: I want to bring to your attention the competition in the way of refined sugars that we will have in New Orleans during the coming winter.

* * * * * * *

What I particularly desire to call your attention to is that the higher we hold our prices for granulated sugar here during the next three months, naturally the more profit these plantations will make on their product, and if the information once gets abroad that it is more profitable for the different plantations to produce granulated sugar than to turn out raws or clarified, I am afraid next season many others will commence doing likewise; consequently, it might be well for you to consider the proposition of permitting New Orleans, during the next three months, to maintain a difference in price below New York of at least 10 cents, and at periods of extreme dullness, when these outsiders here are quoting low prices and selling their product, of even 20 cents per hundred pounds.

What I am particularly interested in is seeing the little outside competition develop as little as possible.

Yours, very truly, J. T. WITHERSPOON.

These letters should be conclusive evidence to any fair-minded person that the Louisiana industry is battling for its very existence against the refiners and repudiate as an infamous slander and falsehood the suggestion that we are making common cause with them.

BITTER ANTAGONISM BETWEEN LOUISIANA CANE GROWERS AND REFINERS.

The antagonism between the refiners and the Louisiana producers never was so bitter as it is to-day. The Louisiana crop, however, was absolutely controlled by the refiners previous to the passage of the recent act of Congress prohibiting railroads from granting secret rebates.

It was their custom to absorb between 70 and 85 per cent of the sugar output of the State, and so completely were they the masters of the situation that as late as November, 1908, their buyers were offering on the floor of the New Orleans Sugar Exchange three-sixteenths of a cent per pound less than the prices quoted for Cuban sugars of the same grade, arrogantly adding that the domestic producer could accept that price or nothing.

Previous to the enactment of the law punishing rebates the planters were afraid to compete with the refiners. Repeated attempts were made to organize cooperative refineries, but these efforts only ended in failure, for the planters realized that wherever they attempted to market their finished sugars the trust would undersell them from 5 to 10 points at a cut.

With only 28 points to work on between raw and refined, and with the secret preferential freight rates enjoyed by the trust known to all the trade, men who would otherwise have preferred to refine their own sugars felt that it would be suicidal to engage in such an unequal battle with the trust.

But the act prohibiting secret railroad rebating gave the planters new hope, and when this was followed by the tariff act reestablishing the present duty of 1⅛ cents a pound, they felt for the first time since the introduction of modern cultural and manufacturing methods that their industry was at last on a secure basis. Large sums of money were expended in improvements and some of the Louisiana plantations are now producing perfectly white high-grade table sugars in competition with the refiners.

To illustrate: The factory at Reserve, La., operated by the Godchaux interests is turning out a white granulated sugar that successfully copes with the product of the American Sugar Refining Co. in the open markets.

The Adeline Refinery, owned by the Oxnard Bros., and which began operations during the past season, turns out a quality of refined white sugar equal to the product of the trust.

There are other plantations in Louisiana now turning out pure white sugars, and if the industry is permitted to live, the entire product of the State will in a short time be finished on the plantations and marketed in competition with the product of the trust.

There is no longer any basis for the statement that the refiners are compelled to finish the Louisiana product before it is fit for human consumption, and since they can no longer stifle competition by means of secret rebates they look with dismay on the increasing output of high-grade white sugars produced on the Louisiana plantations.

It is an open secret in the sugar industry that certain far-reaching improvements are on the eve of introduction which will seriously threaten the very existence of these heavily watered and overcapitalized refining companies. These improvements involve the establishment of a method of manufacture whereby granulated sugar can be made directly from cane juices at practically the same cost as raw sugar.

This would probably be accomplished in Louisiana in three years if there was any future to look forward to after that time, and it is because this economic development threatens their very existence that the refiners are attempting to destroy the American sugar-producing industries.

THE BROAD ECONOMIC PRINCIPLES INVOLVED.

Let us now examine the question from a broad economic standpoint and as between these antagonistic forces—the producers and the refiners—ascertain on which side the interest of the American people lies.

I contend that the refining industry exists in only a few seaboard cities for the purpose of laundering or bleaching tropical sugars, and that it adds nothing to the natural wealth of the country. It gives employment, comparatively speaking, to only an infinitesimal number of American workingmen—about 10,000—and in support of this statement I submit the following figures covering the industry, taken from the last census:

The number of persons actually employed December 15, 1909, was 9,399. In addition, there were 965 male clerks and 52 female clerks and 193 salaried officers, superintendents, and managers. There were 19 sugar refineries, as follows: 5 in Louisiana and 14 in other States—California 2, Massachusetts 2, New Jersey 2, New York 5, Pennsylvania 2, and Texas 1.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to one statement he made which I think ought to be corrected, and I believe he will allow the correction here. He states that something less than 10,000 American citizens are employed in the sugar-refining industry. The fact is that out of the 9,000 people the Senator speaks of as being employed a great majority of them are not American citizens.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for the correction. I meant to say that there are about 10,000 workingmen employed.

Mr. SMOOT. As I said, the great majority of those are foreign laborers and will never become citizens of the United States.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator.

On the other hand, the sugar producers represent both an agricultural and a manufacturing industry that flourishes in 20 States and in our insular possessions, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. Hundreds of thousands of our citizens are engaged in it, fully 2,000,000 souls are dependent upon it, and relying upon the good faith of the Government hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested in it. In my own State the last agricultural census bulletin for Louisiana (p. 160) shows the number of farms growing sugar cane is 34,487, representing 28.6 of all the farms in the State.

The Domestic Sugar Bulletin summarizes the investment in the sugar industry in the States as follows:

Lands, 650,000 acres, with buildings and field improvements	$50,000,000
Sugar factories	35,000,000
Mules	10,000,000
Implements	2,500,000
Plantation railroads and equipment	2,500,000
Total permanent investment	100,000,000

Over $25,000,000 is expended annually in cultivating and harvesting the crop and more than half a million souls are dependent on its preservation in the city of New Orleans and throughout the State.

In the States of the West more than 61,000 farmers are engaged in the production of sugar beets, and in harvesting season more than 120,000 laborers are employed in the fields and 31,000 in the factories. There are more than $85,000,000 invested in beet-sugar factories, and the annual expenditures of the industry exceeds $62,000,000. In the Hawaiian Islands practically the entire population, or 190,000 people, and an investment of over $164,000,000 is entirely dependent upon the sugar industry. In Porto Rico, with a population of 1,108,012 inhabitants, more than 700,000 of the population is dependent on the sugar industry.

Thus we find that an industry upon which approximately 2,000,000 American citizens are dependent for a living and in which over $425,000,000 of capital are invested, an industry developed to its present proportions by reason of a revenue policy which has been consistently followed by the Government from its foundation down to the present time, is suddenly threatened with destruction because of a false sentiment which has been built up for free sugar by reason of the hypocritical campaign of the refiners.

SUGAR ASKS FAIR PLAY, NOT PRIVILEGE—FREE SUGAR UNDEMOCRATIC.

I am a Democrat and am anxious to cooperate with my party in revising the present iniquitous tariff law, but I am first of all a Louisianian, and as the representative of my people I do not propose to see the leading industry of my State made a sacrificial offering on the altar of free trade. All I ask for sugar is fair play and the same treatment that is accorded to other articles. The average reduction in duty on the various schedules in the Underwood bill is about 26 per cent. Why not give sugar that cut of 26 per cent instead of a cut of 100 per cent at the end of the three years? If a duty on sugar can not be defended from a Democratic standpoint as a revenue producer, then every other duty carried in the pending tariff bill is absolutely indefensible.

DEMOCRATIC SENATORS TOOK PRONOUNCED STAND AGAINST FREE SUGAR AFTER BALTIMORE CONVENTION.

The Democratic members of the Finance Committee, Senators Bailey, SIMMONS, STONE, WILLIAMS, KERN, and JOHNSON, in submitting the minority report July 27, 1912 (see Appendix D), on the substitute for the House free-sugar bill, which was subsequent to the Baltimore convention, used these pertinent words:

> The tariff on sugar is peculiarly a revenue tariff. Very much the major part of the tax levied upon the consumer of sugars and sweets goes actually into the United States Treasury for the use and behoof and benefit of the American people. A minor part of the tax goes into the pockets of the producers. Upon numberless articles in the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill the duties are either prohibitive, or very nearly prohibitive, or highly exploitive, and in all these cases very much the major part of the tax levied upon the consumer goes into the pockets of the American producers, a special and favored class, and very scantily, and sometimes not at all, reaches the Treasury. In the next place the majority of the tariff schedules which have been adopted by the House and sent over to the Senate during this Congress make a reduction of about one-third. In the face of its record in connection with other bills the House reduced the duties upon sugars and the products of cane and sugar beets 100 per cent; in other words, entirely canceled the existing duties. It seemed to us that this was not in keeping with the promise of Democratic platforms to reduce present protective duties "gradually" toward and finally to a revenue basis. We have seen no reason why sugar should have been excepted from the general policy advocated by the Democratic Party and believed by us to be right.
> Again, in levying an import duty upon sugar for revenue purposes, we are imitating the time-honored and time-justified precedents.

As is said, sugar has been regarded as the ideal revenue producer from the beginning of the Government down to date, with the exception of a brief interval when the McKinley tariff law was placed upon the statute books by the Republican Party, and a duty upon sugar has always had the indorsement of the Democratic Party leaders.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY ALWAYS FAVORED A SUGAR DUTY.

The first radical Democratic revision of the tariff occurred in 1816, when the duty on sugar was placed at from 4 to 12 cents a pound. John C. Calhoun advocated a duty on sugar in order that the domestic industry might be encouraged, and a host of other distinguished party leaders from that day to this have favored this tax as the ideal one from a Democratic point of view.

The last time the Democratic Party was in control of the Government and sought to readjust the tariff inequalities, during the storm and stress of the conference between the House and Senate President Cleveland addressed a letter to Mr. William L. Wilson, a distinguished educator and political economist, who had long studied the intricacies of the tariff in the shades of the academy, and who, as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, was finally enabled to put many of his theories into practice.

In the course of his letter the last Democratic President said:

> Under our party platform and in accordance with our declared party purposes sugar is a legitimate and logical article of revenue taxation. * * * I do not believe that we should do evil that good may come, but it seems to me that our aim is the completion of a tariff bill and that in taxing sugar for proper purposes and within reasonable bounds, whatever else may be said of our action, we are in no danger of running counter to Democratic principles. With all there is at stake, there must be in the treatment of this article some ground upon which we are willing to stand, where toleration and conciliation may be allowed to solve the problem without demanding the entire surrender of fixed and conscientious convictions.

Those words, uttered nearly 20 years ago, appear in the light of conditions that now confront us to be almost prophetic. Let us hope that the toleration and conciliation counseled by that great Democrat, now gathered to his fathers, may be followed in the consideration of this bill. Let us hope that the same fair treatment will be accorded the American sugar producer as is shown every other industry affected by its provisions and that a rate will be recommended by this Democratic Senate which will enable the Louisiana Senators, while discharging their duty to their people, whose very existence is bound up in the preservation of this industry, at the same time to cast their votes with the party they cherish and for the glory of which they have given a lifelong labor of love.

APPENDIX A.

The wholesale price of sugar dropped from 6.27 cents in 1890 to 4.97 cents in 1910, or more than 20 per cent in 20 years. Since the average wholesale price to-day is about 4.20, there has been an additional drop of 15 per cent in the last three years.

On the other hand, as shown in the following table, there has been a very decided increase in the price of many essential foodstuffs during the decade ending in 1910:

APPENDIX B.

Sugar-tariff reduction—Who wants it and why.

A brief digest of testimony embodied in the hearings held before the Hardwick special committee on the investigation of the American Sugar Refining Co. and others—June to December, 1911.

(Compiled by Truman G. Palmer.)

CHAPTER I.—Shows that the refiners of foreign raw sugar are a unit in desiring the duty on foreign raw sugar reduced or removed.

CHAPTER II.—Shows that the refiners are striving to have the duty reduced on foreign raw sugar in order that they may destroy the increasing competition of the home sugar industry which already forces them to lower prices while the home product is on the market.

CHAPTER III.—Shows that the alleged "Committee of Wholesale Grocers" is Spreckels, the New York sugar refiner, who uses the grocers as a cloak to conceal his identity.

CHAPTER IV.—Shows that when in September, 1911, the sugar refiners marked the price of imported sugar up to 7¼ cents per pound, domestic sugar was not on the market.

CHAPTER V.—Shows that when domestic sugar came onto the market, in October, it was that, and that alone, which brought the refiners' price down to 6.11 cents in November and 5.63 cents in December.

CHAPTER VI.—Shows that the most effective manner in which to lower the price of sugar permanently is to increase the home production.

CHAPTER I.—WHO WANTS THE DUTY REDUCED ON FOREIGN RAW SUGARS?

CLAUS A. SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. In other words, perhaps, you would take it [the tariff] all off, would you not, and have free trade?

Mr. SPRECKELS. I would have free trade. (Part 27, p. 2277 of hearings.)

Mr. HINDS. You would have free trade in sugar?

CHARLES R. HEIKE, SECRETARY AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO. FROM 1887 TO 1910.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, if the duty were removed absolutely on sugar could we produce either cane or beets in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. I doubt it very much.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then that would destroy the industry absolutely in this country?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And you would approve of that?

Mr. HEIKE. Yes. (Part 4, p. 292 of hearings.)

WILLIAM G. GILMORE, PARTNER ARBUCKLE BROS., SUGAR REFINERS.

Mr. MADISON. In other words, you think the thing to do is to take off the duty, and that it would be to your advantage to take it off as a refiner of cane sugar?

Mr. GILMORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADISON. And you would advocate the taking off of the duty?

Mr. GILMORE. I would personally. I am only speaking now personally. (Part 14, p. 1169 of hearings.)

JAMES H. POST, PRESIDENT NATIONAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. POST. If Congress did not need the revenue from sugar. That is a different propcsition. But they have to have it from something, and sugar seems to be the thing that has paid a part of it for a great many years. As far as I personally am concerned, I would like to see free sugar. As we look at the country at large, however, I think it would be a very unfair proposition. (Part 6, p. 527 of hearings.)

WILLIAM A. J. JAMISON, PARTNER, ARBUCKLE BROS.

Mr. RAKER. How would it affect you if there was no tax on the importation of sugar—raw sugar?

Mr. JAMISON. I think it would enable us to run more constantly.

Mr. RAKER. What do you mean by that, now?

Mr. JAMISON. To keep up the capacity.

Mr. RAKER. Will you explain it?

Mr. JAMISON. I mean we would be able to sell more sugar.

Mr. RAKER. Do you not have a supply all the time?

Mr. JAMISON. Well, we are not able to run full at all times.

Mr. RAKER. Because of the way raw sugar is shipped into the United States?

Mr. JAMISON. Oh, no; on account of the beet product. If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous, and we would probably sell more sugar. If the duty was removed, I mean to say. * * *

Mr. RAKER. * * * What would you think would be a fair compensation? [Reduction.]

Mr. JAMISON. I think there should be a cent a pound taken off at the present time at least; and later——

Mr. RAKER. A little more?

Mr. JAMISON. Yes; until it is entirely removed. (Part 14, pp. 1195–1196 of hearings.)

EDWIN F. ATKINS, VICE PRESIDENT AND ACTING PRESIDENT AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. So that a reduction of the tariff passing beyond a moderate amount would tend to the prosperity of the refiners and to the detriment of the beet-sugar people?

Mr. ATKINS. Take the independent refiners, outside of our concern at all, that represent more than half the supply of the United States. They say, and I think they say truly, that it is for the refiners' interest to have a low rate of duty rather than a high rate of duty, and reduce the basis of value upon which they can sell. The lower the price of the refined sugar the greater is the consumption. I think their position is well taken. (Part 2, p. 174 of hearings.)

CHAPTER II.—WHY THE REFINERS WANT THE DUTY REDUCED ON FOREIGN RAW SUGAR.

EDWIN F. ATKINS, VICE PRESIDENT AND ACTING PRESIDENT AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it really on account of the competition, Mr. Atkins? * * *

Mr. ATKINS. I think so. * * * There is very much larger capacity than is required, and the beet sugars are taking away the trade of the refiners year by year. (Part 1, p. 48 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. MADISON. So you can hardly ascribe it to the fierce competition by the beet-sugar people?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly. All that beet sugar comes on the market at a certain season of the year. It is all produced in about three months' time. They all want to market it just as rapidly as possible, and in order to do that they come to the eastern points. California sugar comes into Chicago and the Michigan sugar into Buffalo and Pittsburgh, and eastern refineries, not only the American Sugar Refining Co. but the others, have to reduce or close down until the beet sugars are out of the way. Any refining that is done between the 1st of October and the 1st of January is done without any profit and very often at a loss.

Mr. MADISON. Then, as a matter of fact, your competition with the beet-sugar people exists only during a few months of the year?

Mr. ATKINS. Three months, and that is 25 per cent of the whole time. (Part 1, p. 49 of hearings.)

[Query: If the production and marketing of 600,000 tons of domestic beet sugar gives the consumer cheaper sugar for 3 months out of 12, how many months would 1,200,000 tons make it cheaper, and what would be the effect if the production were 2,400,000 tons?]

Mr. MADISON. You stated a moment ago, Mr. Atkins, or this morning, that you decidedly opposed going into the beet-sugar business. What was the reason of that? * * *

Mr. ATKINS. The beet-sugar business was a competitive business. It was produced in the western territories, where out market lay. That is, I say "our market"—I mean the market of the refiners, the various refiners. As that industry grew—and I foresaw that it would grow rapidly—I believed that it would reduce the volume of business, not only of the American Sugar Refining Co. but of all the refiners on the Atlantic coast; and although we had millions of dollars invested in the business there we were building up a competitive business, one that would compete with ourselves and one which was bound to get away from us; we could not control it in the end. I say "we"—I had no connection whatever with it; that was simply a business man's opinion. (Part 1, pp. 85–86 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. GARRETT. Do you know whether last year, at the time the beet-sugar manufactories began operations, any of the refining plants belonging to the American Sugar Refining Co. received instructions to, or did without instructions, withdraw from the territory usually covered by the beet-sugar trade?

Mr. ATKINS. No; not through any instructions. They were forced to withdraw from the territory, owing to the cutting of prices. * * * (Part 1, p. 94 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. RAKER. How far west do you ship?

Mr. ATKINS. We ship, when we are able to do so, out to Omaha and Kansas City.

Mr. RAKER. You ship no farther than those points?

Mr. ATKINS. We would if we could, but we can not get in there, owing to the competition of the beet factories. * * * (Part 1, p. 99 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

CLAUS A. SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. Can you tell me how far in the East the beet-sugar people are able to market their sugar?

Mr. SPRECKELS. There is the dividing line on the Missouri River. They sometimes come as far as Pittsburgh. I think the American Beet Sugar Co. has come once as far as New York City.

Mr. HINDS. Have they not come into New England, Mr. Spreckels?

Mr. SPRECKELS. They have come into the State of New York.

Mr. HINDS. Have they not also come into New England some?

Mr. SPRECKELS. I think so.

Mr. HINDS. One member of the firm of Arbuckles testified that they had come into New England.
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes, sir.
Mr. HINDS. Are they showing a tendency to come farther east all the time?
Mr. SPRECKELS. They are.
Mr. HINDS. And they make the competition severer, if it is competition?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes.
Mr. HINDS. Continually?
Mr. SPRECKELS. Yes, sir. They have frequently come as far as Pittsburgh. (Part 27, p. 2269 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Spreckels, you have been carrying on a campaign to reduce the tariff as beneficial to the cane-sugar refiners?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I have.
Mr. HINDS. Of course that will be damaging to the beet-sugar refiners?
Mr. SPRECKELS. To some extent it will. (Part 27, p. 2275 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. HINDS. In other words, perhaps you would take it (the tariff) all off, would you not, and have free trade
Mr. SPRECKELS. I would have free trade. (Part 27, p. 2277 of hearings.)
Mr. HINDS. You would have free trade in sugar?

* * * * * * *

WILLIAM G. GILMORE, PARTNER, ARBUCKLE BROS., SUGAR REFINERS.

Mr. RAKER. The beet-sugar people got in Pittsburgh, Pa.?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes.
Mr. RAKER. From where?
Mr. GILMORE. I do not know where from. I do not know what the brand was or anything about it. I know the fact.
Mr. RAKER. What time of the year was it?
Mr. GILMORE. I know that it was so much so that a house owned by Arbuckle Bros. there was compelled to take the beet-sugar business in and buy it and sell it in competition. That is bringing coals home to Newcastle. (Part 14, p. 1159 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. GILMORE. The home beet-sugar industry of course is curtailing the sale of the cane-sugar products. You can not sell it twice.
Mr. MADISON. In other words, if they were out of the way, you would make more money?
Mr. GILMORE. We would have more employment, I suppose, for our output, for our capacity—our refining capacity.
Mr. MADISON. And the ultimate conclusion is you would make more money?
Mr. GILMORE. I think we would.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MADISON. Suppose as a matter of fact they get to a point where, instead of producing about 600,000 tons of sugar a year, they actually produce a million and a half tons of sugar, what effect would that have?
Mr. GILMORE. It would shut down most of the eastern refineries for a part of the season.
Mr. MADISON. You would have to quit the business?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MADISON. It would be beneficial (removing the duty from sugar) inasmuch as it would destroy the beet-sugar people?
Mr. GILMORE. It would keep them at home.
Mr. MADISON. Keep them in a limited locality?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes.
Mr. MADISON. And leave the field to you people that is naturally yours, as you feel?
Mr. GILMORE. Our natural field. Yes.
Mr. MADISON. In other words, you feel that all east of the Mississippi River * * * is the natural field of the cane-sugar refiners, while the Plains and Mountain States, where conditions are favorable to the production of beet sugar, is the natural field for the beet-sugar people?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes; I think so. (Part 14, p. 1168 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

WILLIAM A. J. JAMISON, PARTNER, ARBUCKLE BROS.

Mr. RAKER. Michigan sugar, you say, competes with yours in New York?
Mr. JAMISON. Yes; the Michigan sugar has been down to New York State and all through there. It has interfered with us very largely in sales in Ohio and Pennsylvania.
Mr. RAKER. And West Virginia?
Mr. JAMISON. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Mr. RAKER. Do you not have a supply all the time?
Mr. JAMISON. Well, we are not able to run full at all times.
Mr. RAKER. Because of the way raw sugar is shipped into the United States?
Mr. JAMISON. Oh, no; on account of the beet product. If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous, and we would probably sell more sugar. If the duty was removed, I mean to say. (Part 14, p. 1195 of hearings.)

WASHINGTON B. THOMAS, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS, AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. MALBY. You have to-day competition among the beet-sugar industries of the United States, have you not?
Mr. THOMAS. We have.
Mr. MALBY. And good, sharp competition, say, with the Michigan Sugar Refining Co.?
Mr. THOMAS. We have. (Part 24, p. 2013 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. MALBY. So that, reverting to the question once more, if the beet-sugar industry was wholly destroyed, then you would get in there, would you not?
Mr. THOMAS. We would extend our sales, undoubtedly.
Mr. MALBY. Let us be frank about it. You would extend your sales to every single household where beet sugar is now sold, which would pay the price, would you not?
Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes. It would take the place of beet sugar. (Part 24, p. 2014 of hearings.)

ROBERT M. PARKER, PRESIDENT OF THE BROOKLYN COOPERAGE CO., OWNED BY THE AMERICAN SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. MALBY. Does the American Sugar Refining Co. at the present time ship any granulated sugar to the various States in the Mississippi Valley and in the Missouri region?
Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; a very great deal.
Mr. MALBY. And at all times of the year?
Mr. PARKER. Yes, sir; until the price is so low that it is impossible to ship it at a profit.
Mr. MALBY. Who makes the prices low, or creates the condition to which you refer?
Mr. PARKER. The San Francisco cane, and the beet sugars from Colorado and Utah and Michigan. (Part 17, p. 1463 of hearings.)

CHAPTER III.—HOW THE REFINERS ARE WORKING TO SECURE LOWER DUTIES ON FOREIGN RAW SUGAR.

Following is a copy of the heading of circulars which are being distributed broadcast, praying that the duty on foreign raw sugar be reduced:

"Committee of Wholesale Grocers.—Formed to assist in obtaining cheaper sugar for consumers through reduction of duties on raw and refined sugars.

"F. J. Dessoir, chairman; F. C. Lowry, secretary and treasurer. 138 Front Street, New York, N. Y.

[NOTE.—138 Front Street is the office of the Federal Sugar Refining Co.]

FRANK C. LOWRY, SALES AGENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO., "SECRETARY" AND "TREASURER" THE "COMMITTEE OF WHOLESALE GROCERS."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Lowry, I notice by a paper here that you are secretary, and the paper says secretary and treasurer, of the grocerymen's committee.
Mr. LOWRY. That is correct.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. Who was instrumental, Mr. Lowry, in organizing that committee?
Mr. LOWRY. I was.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. You alone, then, organized the committee, did you?
Mr. LOWRY. I did.
Mr. FORDNEY. When and where, Mr. Lowry, was the meeting held at which it was formed, and who was present?
Mr. LOWRY. There have been no regular meetings by calling these people together from all over the country. * * *
Mr. FORDNEY. You have never had a meeting of any of the members mentioned in this pamphlet?
Mr. LOWRY. I never have called them together. * * *
Mr. FORDNEY. So there never has been a meeting of the committee since it has been organized?
Mr. LOWRY. Not as a whole; no.
Mr. FORDNEY. Have you ever had any of the members of the committee together, except as a personal interview by you?
Mr. LOWRY. No.
Mr. FORDNEY. You never have had?
Mr. LOWRY. No.
Mr. FORDNEY. What are the dues of the members, please?
Mr. LOWRY. There are none.
Mr. FORDNEY. There are none at all?
Mr. LOWRY. It is just an informal committee.
Mr. FORDNEY. How much money has been spent in distributing literature by that committee?
Mr. LOWRY. Somewhere in the neighborhood of $12,000.
Mr. FORDNEY. Who paid that money?
Mr. LOWRY. * * * the only one that subscribed was the Federal Sugar Refining Co.
Mr. FORDNEY. So that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. have paid in this $12,000 for the distribution of the literature?
Mr. LOWRY. Yes.
Mr. FORDNEY. And no other concern has paid in any sums of money?
Mr. LOWRY. No other concern; no. (Part 19, pp. 1607–1608, of hearings.)

[Later Mr. Lowry testified before the Finance Committee of the Senate, on Tuesday, Apr. 9, 1912, as follows (p. 280):

Mr. SMOOT How much have you expended in this organization (Wholesale Grocers' Committee)?
Mr. LOWRY. From 1909 up until last spring we had spent about $12,000. Since then we have spent, perhaps, $4,000 or $5,000. That would make about $16,000 in three years, all of which money has come from the Federal Sugar Refining Co.]

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. The Federal Sugar Refining Co. has paid, then, for the distribution of all this literature?
Mr. LOWRY. Yes; so far they have. (Part 19, p. 1609 of hearings, July 13, 1911.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. You are still secretary of this committee of the wholesale grocers' organization?
Mr. LOWRY. So far; yes, sir.
Mr. FORDNEY. You testified here last spring that you were "it"—the whole thing?
Mr. LOWRY. No; I did not mean for you to construe it that way. I do not construe it that way.
Mr. FORDNEY. Well, have conditions changed as to finances and initiation fees and dues and all those things since the time when you were here last spring?
Mr. LOWRY. No.
Mr. FORDNEY. Does Mr. Spreckels donate all the expenses, pay all the expenses of sending out this literature? That is what you told us before.
Mr. LOWRY. He has been the only subscriber so far. (Part 41, p. 3379 of hearings, Dec. 9, 1911.)

* * * * * * *

CLAUS A. SPRECKELS, PRESIDENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Spreckels, you have been carrying on a campaign to reduce the tariff as beneficial to the cane-sugar refiners?
Mr. SPRECKELS. I have.
Mr. HINDS. Of course, that will be damaging to the beet-sugar refiners?
Mr. SPRECKELS. To some extent, it will. (Part 27, p. 2275 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. HINDS. Now, Mr. Spreckels, it was testified in Washington that in the movement for lowering the tariff on sugar, the movement which is going on now and in which you were interested, that your company had expended $12,000 for literature, etc.

Mr. SPRECKELS. Possibly. I do not know what the amount is. I dare say we have. (Part 27, p. 2276 of hearings.)

CHAPTER IV.—WHY THE PRICE OF SUGAR WENT UP IN 1911.

WALLACE P. WILLETT, OF WILLETT & GRAY, PUBLISHERS WEEKLY STATISTICAL SUGAR TRADE JOURNAL.

(Because of his long experience in sugar statistical work Mr. Willett was engaged by the Hardwick committee as a sugar expert.)

The CHAIRMAN. Your business?

Mr. WILLETT. Principally a wire-service news bureau covering the United States and a cable service covering every sugar country in the world, virtually, and also the publishing of a daily and weekly sugar-trade journal, and brokers in raw and refined sugars to a moderate extent. (Part 37, p. 3063 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Willett, for the last 40 or 50 years you have been a close observer of sugar conditions throughout the world?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir; I have been in the trade constantly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that include prices in various foreign countries from year to year?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It includes, of course, American prices?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In every section of the country?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Wholesale and retail?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Willett, there was quite a sudden rise in the price of sugar early in the fall. I think it probably began in September, did it not, or possibly a little earlier than that?

Mr. WILLETT. You refer to 1911?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; there was a sharp advance in price.

Mr. WILLETT. The rise dates back to June or July.

The CHAIRMAN. The movement really started in June or July, 1911?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But it did not get very much accentuated until the early fall, did it?

Mr. WILLETT. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And then it jumped very suddenly, almost 2 cents a pound, did it not?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir. (Part 37, p. 3065 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. * * * You started to explain why sugar went up so suddenly and so sharply this fall.

Mr. WILLETT. Along in March of this year [1911] it began to develop by the statistical figures that the 800,000 tons supposed surplus had rapidly disappeared. Nobody knew where, but it was disappearing or had disappeared.

The CHAIRMAN. How could it disappear—by people buying it up in advance to fill advance contracts?

Mr. WILLETT. We can only have a theory on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that. Suppose you give us your theory on that subject.

Mr. WILLETT. My theory is that there was a mistake in the crop estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, that the surplus was not really there?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It had been reported, but did not exist?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes; and speculators in Europe, who are always looking out for points, began then to make their movement, and as it followed soon after that that bad crop reports for the campaign of the present season—1911—began to be made, prices began to rise on the speculative sugar exchanges of Europe, and the crop reports going from bad to worse was the immediate cause of the rapid rise which you have called attention to.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were those crop reports from which affected most the sugar market?

Mr. WILLETT. From Germany. Germany produced in 1910, for instance, 2,200,000 tons of sugar. As the reports of damage to the country grew stronger and stronger, the estimate for Germany for this season fell to about 1,200,000 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, a million tons shortage in Germany?

Mr. WILLETT. One million tons short.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give us in round figures what the shortage was estimated to be throughout the beet-sugar section of Europe?

Mr. WILLETT. Two million tons.

The CHAIRMAN. A shortage of 2,000,000 in European beet sugar?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes; and Germany was the principal one. Germany above her own consumption sends 774,000 tons to the United Kingdom, and in all her exports sends over a million tons out of the country, while it appears from present estimates that she will have only about 27,000 tons to send out of the country beyond her own requirements for consumption. That leaves the United Kingdom to secure 700,000 tons from other sources during the present campaign, and that is the basis for present prices for sugars in the United Kingdom, and the reason why the British Government is trying to obtain larger concessions on the exportation from Russia this year. (Part 37, p. 3067 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. * * * Was there any shortage in the Cuban crop?

Mr. WILLETT. The Cuban crop at the beginning of the season was estimated to reach 1,800,000 tons. As a matter of fact, it reached 1,468,000 tons, a shortage of three or four hundred thousand tons.

The CHAIRMAN. How about the Java crop?

Mr. WILLETT. The Java crop was larger. (Part 37, p. 3068 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what was the total shortage under the estimates?

Mr. WILLETT. Both cane and beet?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WILLETT. Two million tons. (Part 37, p. 3068 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

FRANK C. LOWRY, SALES AGENT FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.

Mr. FORDNEY. * * * I want to know what the Federal Sugar Refining Co. sold sugars for.

Mr. LOWRY. The Federal Sugar Refining Co. and other refineries on July 6 advanced their price from 5 to 5.1. Shortly after that the market advanced rapidly because of the drought in Europe doing serious injury to the beet crop. The market advanced 10 points, 15 points, and so on, and about the 1st of August it reached 5.75.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LOWRY. * * * Now, the market advanced right on up to 6.75, and the trade kept buying on each successive advance. When the market reached 6.75——

Mr. FORDNEY. When was that?

Mr. LOWRY. In the latter part of September—somewhere around the 25th of September, I think.

Mr. LOWRY. * * * The demand came on to us so fast we could not take care of it, and we went to 7 cents. Arbuckle & Co. were delivering promptly, and they went to 7 cents. We were about 10 days oversold at the time, and Arbuckle was the only refiner prepared to give immediate delivery, and he jumped his price to 7.5 cents. We had, as I remember it, somewhere in the neighborhood of enough raw sugar on hand to make 60,000 or 75,000 barrels of sugar, and the trade was coming to us so fast that it soon cleaned us up. We did not want to be cleaned out. We wanted to keep in the market and supply our customers right along, and we put the price at 7.25, and at 7.25 the market stopped, and from that time on, whether we talk about beet sugars or cane sugars, the market became absolutely a jobber's market. The beet-sugar price was 6.5 cents. (Part 41, pp. 3362–3363 of hearings.)

* * * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. What are you selling for now?

Mr. LOWRY. We have been cutting the market this last week and got down to 5.65.

Mr. FORDNEY. 5.65. Now, why?

Mr. LOWRY. The same price made by the Michigan beet-sugar companies. (Part 41, p. 3364 of hearings.)

CHAPTER V.—WHY THE PRICE OF SUGAR, AFTER GOING UP IN 1911, CAME DOWN AGAIN.

WALLACE P. WILLETT, OF WILLETT & GRAY, PUBLISHERS WEEKLY STATISTICAL SUGAR TRADE JOURNAL.

Mr. SULZER. Would not the elimination of import duties on sugar materially reduce the cost to the manufacturers of sugar and the consumers in the United States?

Mr. WILLETT. At times it would, but at other times it would not.

Mr. SULZER. At what times would it not reduce it?

Mr. WILLETT. This year.

Mr. SULZER. Why not this year?

Mr. WILLETT. Well, because we had a very present example that the moment our American beet-sugar production became available on the market the rise stopped and, owing entirely and totally to this American production, refined sugars were a cent and a half lower than they were at the highest point. But for that American production we to-day would be buying sugar at the world's prices. We can not get rid of it. There is no other source from which we could get sugar. (Part 37, p. 3084 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. HINDS. Then there were two advantages from the beet-sugar crop this year, so far as the public were concerned—the advantage of a slightly lower price because they did not foresee the rise, and the other advantage of having that store of sugar in the country, I suppose?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes.

Mr. HINDS. What would be the other advantage?

Mr. WILLETT. To supply the country during the intermediate period between crops.

Mr. HINDS. If we had not had that store of sugar in this country, we would have had to do as Europe did, and import sugar?

Mr. WILLETT. We would have had to do as Europe did—import sugar, from Java, principally.

Mr. HINDS. Would that have resulted in slightly further raising the sugar price?

Mr. WILLETT. Undoubtedly; in addition to the demand of Europe, the demand of America would have made the price higher than any other price we have seen. (Part 37, p. 3094 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. WILLETT. In the business world it would be. As a matter of fact, right there, the Colorado beet-sugar factories did concede to the citizens of their own State, and the factories of Utah also did concede, and had the prices remained high those citizens of those countries where the beet-sugar factories were would have continued to benefit by a reduced price given them locally. The manufacturers of Colorado refused to sell their sugars over the Colorado line at the same price that they would sell them for in the State of Colorado. That shows the benefit of the beet-sugar industry, for instance, in the State of Colorado under an abnormal year like 1911. (Part 37, p. 3110, of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. WILLETT. The beet-sugar men this year sold their crop largely in anticipation of deliveries along in September.

Mr. MALBY. So that they did not realize large prices?

Mr. WILLETT. I understand they realized about an average of 5¼ cents for their crop.

Mr. MALBY. Which would be much less than the market price at the time of delivery?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MALBY. Of course the beet sugar coming upon the market at that time undoubtedly did have an effect upon the whole market price of sugar, did it not?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir. (Part 37, p. 3112, of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. The domestic beet-sugar industry has certainly had a beneficial influence upon the price of sugar.

Mr. WILLETT. Yes; an enormous influence. If it were not for the domestic sugar industry, sugars in this country would be to-day very considerably higher. I can not say how much higher, because I can not tell what influence they have had upon the European market, but the refiners would be compelled to purchase a quantity of sugar in foreign ports equal to the production of beet sugar coming into the market from this country. I would not be surprised if it would not be a cent a pound more but for the beet and cane sugar produced in this country. (Part 38, pp. 3153–3154, of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. My idea in having this matter repeated, if it is repetition, was to understand, Mr. Willett, who is probably the greatest living American authority on sugar prices, whether or not in point of fact the market and trade reports seemed to indicate that the beet-sugar people were sold ahead or not. You say they were sold ahead?

Mr. WILLETT. They were sold ahead. (Part 43, p. 3579 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. BAKER. If that is a fact, can not Mr. Willett give us his view, from his thorough examination and knowledge of the matter, what was the prime inducement that brought down the price of sugar?

Mr. WILLETT. It was the coming on the market of the American beet-sugar crop; but not put on the market by the refiners but by the jobbers who had bought it at the lower refined price and sold it at the market price. The jobbers made the money and the beet-sugar men did not. (Part 43, p. 3579 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. WILLETT. There is no question whatever, Mr. Chairman, that the coming onto the market in October of the Michigan sugars and other domestic sugars dropped the price from 6.57 in October down to 6.11 in November, and December 5.63. (Part 43, p. 3581 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. But, Mr. Willett, immediately after beet sugar came onto the market in October down went the price of sugar to about 5.75.

Mr. WILLETT. That was because of the coming on of the beet crop, filling up the gap of known supply. (Part 43, p. 3584 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

CHAPTER VI.—HOW TO LOWER THE PRICE OF SUGAR PERMANENTLY.

WALLACE P. WILLETT, OF WILLETT & GRAY, PUBLISHERS WEEKLY STATISTICAL SUGAR TRADE JOURNAL.

Mr. SULZER. What, in your judgment as an expert, would bring about a permanent reduction of the cost of manufactured sugar to the consumers of the United States?

Mr. WILLETT. By increasing the amount of domestic production and in Porto Rico and Hawaii; that is, by increasing the quantity of sugar within the United States to the extent that we would be required to purchase no sugar whatever at world prices. Last year we bought only 77,000 tons at the world price. We were as near as that to that condition in 1910. We did come within 77,000 tons of being entirely free and independent of the world's prices, whereas a few years before we had been importing 6,700,000 tons. [Misprint; should be 670,000.]

Mr. SULZER. In other words, you think it advisable for the Government of the United States to do everything within its legitimate scope to encourage the growth of cane and beet sugar in the United States?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. And in our insular possessions?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir; in our insular possessions.

Mr. SULZER. And you also would recommend the abolition of all tariff taxes upon the importation of sugar?

Mr. WILLETT. No, sir. Do you mean import duties?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLETT. No, sir.

Mr. SULZER. Would not the elimination of import duties on sugar materially reduce the cost to the manufacturers of sugar and the consumers in the United States?

Mr. WILLETT. At times it would, but at other times it would not.

Mr. SULZER. At what times would it not reduce it?

Mr. WILLETT. This year.

Mr. SULZER. Why not this year?

Mr. WILLETT. Well, because we had a very present example that the moment our American beet-sugar production became available on the market the rise stopped, and, owing entirely and totally to this American production, refined sugars were a cent and a half lower than they were at the highest point. But for that American production we to-day would be buying sugar at the world's prices. We can not get rid of it. There is no other source from which we could get sugar.

Mr. SULZER. But you fail to grasp the point I was suggesting. If the manufacturers of sugar in the United States could get raw sugar free, they would be able to sell the manufactured sugar cheaper to the American consumer just now?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. Hence, the elimination of the tariff tax upon importations of sugar would cheapen the price of sugar to the people of the United States?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir; and to the manufacturer.

Mr. SULZER. And that is one way to get cheaper sugar for the people?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. And another way to get cheaper sugar for the people of the United States would be to encourage the production of beet and cane sugar in the United States and in her insular possessions?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. And these are the only two ways by which sugar can be sold to the consumer more cheaply?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir; and in one of these ways the price of sugar would be dependent on the f. o. b. Hamburg market, but in the other case the price would be entirely independent of the f. o. b. Hamburg market. (Part 37, pp. 3083–3084 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. HINDS. How much beet sugar did they produce in this country this year?

Mr. WILLETT. Five hundred and fifty thousand tons.

Mr. HINDS. How much do you think that they ought to produce in order to maintain a proper equilibrium of prices here?

Mr. WILLETT. Well, just double that amount will do it. I believe that amount, a million tons, would carry us well below any excess in the world's prices.

Mr. HINDS. And would be a great advantage in giving us independence of Europe?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes, sir; and that is a tremendous advantage. (Part 37, p. 3086 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. SULZER. If we could produce all the sugar we need for our own consumption, we would be absolutely independent of the world's market, would we not?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. And the fixing of prices in Hamburg and other places would have absolutely no effect on the consumers of the United States so far as the price is concerned?

Mr. WILLETT. Not the slightest.

Mr. SULZER. Quite true. Then it is your opinion that it would be a good thing for the Government to encourage the agricultural people of the United States to engage in the production of beet sugar wherever they can do so profitably?

Mr. WILLETT. Decidedly so.

Mr. SULZER. We have vast areas of this country now, have we not, that are peculiarly susceptible to the growth of sugar beets if they were irrigated and properly cultivated?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. And with very little effort on the part of the agencies of Government which are now in vogue these vast areas could be brought into production?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. And a great increase of beet-sugar production could be brought about?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes. (Part 37, p. 3090 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. HINDS. You speak of our being independent of Europe?

Mr. WILLETT. Yes.

Mr. HINDS. Even, although we produced enough to, as you might say, supply ourselves, nevertheless that would not give us sugar any cheaper than they would get it in Europe on that specific year, would it?

Mr. WILLETT. It would give us sugar always cheaper than they would get it in Europe in any year, if I understand your question right.

Mr. HINDS. Yes. You think, then, it would be possible for us to get sugar, by reason of our greater production——

Mr. WILLETT. At all times——

Mr. HINDS (continuing). Under the world's price?

Mr. WILLETT. At all times under the world's price. We get it now at all times except for two or three months in the year. (Part 37, p. 3095 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Mr. WILLETT. * * * This promotion of our industry is a much more vital point (from the consumers' standpoint included) than is a reduction of tariff to a point that lets in foreign sugar and thereby diminishes the home production. Whenever we reach the condition indicated, competition between our free and partially free duty producers will begin and the consumers will benefit thereby and the United States will be entirely free from the speculative and other influences which control the world's price, and it is not unreasonable to expect that under the conditions indicated the United States will become a considerable exporter of its surplus production to the foreign countries which may be short of supplies as under present conditions abroad.

As showing the ultimate effect of home production equal to or surpassing home consumption, I call attention specially for earnest consideration to the fact that in 1910 we reached this desired consummation within 74,000 tons, and as a result we were almost independent of Europe, so much so, in fact, that we got our supplies from Cuba at over one-half cent per pound under the world's prices, during which time one man (Santa Maria) was carrying on a big bull speculation in Europe in which we would certainly have been involved but for this limited amount we required that year. In 1911 the Cuban crop fell short of 1910 by 320,898 tons, and we required 212,182 tons from abroad to complete our supplies; hence we were involved in the world's prices in 1911, and the result was a hue and cry against the high prices of sugar. I am not making an argument, but am simply pointing to the facts that appear to me to make the consideration of the increase in our local supplies of greater importance in legislation than a reduction of duties beyond certain limits, those limits to be such as will positively exclude all sugars outside those of our States and dependencies. (Part 43, pp. 3556–3557 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

In all these analyses I reach the same conclusion—that to decrease the price of sugar to the consumer, increase the domestic production as rapidly as possible. (Part 48, p. 3978 of hearings, the concluding paragraph of Mr. Willett's testimony.)

DR. HARVEY W. WILEY, CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The CHAIRMAN. And if the Dutch standard could be wiped out it could all come in?

Dr. WILEY. Yes; if we could import as much refined sugar as raw sugar; but it wouldn't do any good in the world and would hurt the beet-sugar industry, and I have been encouraging it. I believe it to be one of the best things for the agriculture of this country that could possibly exist, because if one raises beets he must use scientific methods. Every beet-sugar field is practically an experimental station which teaches every farmer in the neighborhood. I am in favor of protecting the sugar crop in Louisiana and all along the coast. I am not making a plea for taking the tariff off of sugar at all; I am only trying to tell you what the Dutch standard does.

The CHAIRMAN. You say you are in favor of protecting sugar. Do you believe there will ever be any chance for our competing with the world without protection?

Dr. WILEY. Maybe so in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. Although you see reasonable prospects of that I ask do you see any chance of it?

Dr. WILEY. I would protect them even if I thought there would never be any chance of it. I want to purchase our own sugar at home. (Part 42, p. 3445 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Dr. WILEY. I look at this matter as I do everything else in which the farmers are interested: I want the farmers to have a fair chance in the markets, governed by supply and demand as to rise and fall, and not have everything they grow and everything they buy manipulated as to price by somebody that has nobody's interests at heart but their own. I can not sell a steer to-day, or a bushel of wheat, or a bushel of corn at a price governed by supply and demand, nor can you. The price of a steer, or of a bushel of wheat, or of a bushel of corn is set by a set of gamblers in Chicago or elsewhere. (Part 42, p. 3447 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Dr. WILEY. But the point I am giving is this, that under the present system we are absolutely dependent upon the refiners of this country for our sugar. They have taught us to use white sugar, and we will not take any other kind; and therefore they can fix any price thereon they please. I will say, on the question of price, that I think they are very reasonable about it and do not try to squeeze us very much. At the same time, whenever the Louisiana sugar comes in the price of sugar drops, and whenever the crop of beet sugar comes in the price of sugar drops. Again, as soon as the Louisiana and beet sugar men sell all they have to sell the price of sugar goes up again.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is true of last summer, I believe.

Dr. WILEY. Yes; and when the price of sugar went up to 7 cents retail I said, "Watch out; when the sugar crop comes in it will go down," and it did, and there was no sugar in the country even then. (Part 42, p. 3446 of hearings.)

Mr. FORDNEY. The fact is that the refiner in New York does not control the market while our domestic sugar crop is on the market?

Dr. WILEY. As soon as the domestic sugar crop comes on they let the price drop, for they are then buyers themselves. They buy the most of the domestic crop except the beet sugar—buy almost all of the Louisiana crop.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is because it is raw sugar?

Dr. WILEY. Yes. They then want to buy and put the price down.

Mr. FORDNEY. And as soon as the crop is purchased they increase the price, do you mean?

Dr. WILEY. Yes; as high as they think the people will stand for. They do not put the price out of sight, because that would not be good business. (Part 42, p. 3448 of hearings.)

* * * * * * *

Dr. WILEY. * * * When I consider the beneficial effect of this sugar industry on other agricultural industries I would go as far as it would be profitable to the farmers of the United States to maintain that industry.

The CHAIRMAN. No matter how much it cost the people who consumed that sugar?

Dr. WILEY. Yes; no matter how much it cost. If it were a benefit to the agricultural interests of this country as a whole, then I am for it. If I looked at it simply from the standpoint of the interest of the man making the sugar, as I stated before, I would not want to tax myself as a consumer too much, but if I see that by paying a little more for my sugar the great agricultural industry in this country is benefited, I am willing to pay it. I would go just that far. (Part 42, p. 3455 of hearings.)

APPENDIX C.

We consume in the United States about 3,984,567 tons of sugar of 2,000 pounds per ton. In the crop year 1911–12 Louisiana and Texas produced 361,920 tons, of which about one-fourth was refined and the remainder was raw or unclarified.

During the same period there were 599,000 tons of refined beet sugar made in the Western States—thus giving a total domestic production that year of 960,000 tons.

We imported—

	Tons.
From Hawaii	602,733
From Porto Rico	367,145
From the Philippines	217,785
From Cuba	1,593,315
From all other countries	241,209

All of which was raw sugar. That from Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines came in free of duty. That from Cuba paid a duty of 1½ cents a pound, and that from other countries 1.68 cents.

All of this sugar, except the 599,000 tons of beet sugar, which left the factories a finished product ready for consumption, and about 85,000 tons of refined Louisiana sugar (total 684,000 tons), is refined by the trust and other refiners before going on the market.

APPENDIX D.

[Senate Report No. 763, part 2, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

DUTIES ON SUGAR.

(July 27, 1912.—Ordered to be printed.)

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following views of the minority (to accompany H. R. 21213):

The undersigned minority members of the Finance Committee, to which was referred H. R. 21213, beg leave to report a substitute for the same, and in explanation of the character of the bill and in declaration of their salient reasons for preferring it to the House bill, to which it is offered as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, submit the following brief statement:

The substitute which we propose differs from existing law (Schedule E of the Payne-Aldrich bill, approved Aug. 5, 1909) in the following respects:

First. The substitute abolishes the so-called differential.

Second. It abolishes the No. 16 Dutch standard color test and it substitutes for it no other legislative joker, as it is charged that the substitute proposed by the majority members of the Finance Committee does.

Third. In rates of duty the existing law levies ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound on sugars, tank bottoms, sirups, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses testing by the polariscope not above 75°. The substitute levies a tax of sixty-three one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound upon the same articles. Under the existing law, for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test there is levied an additional tax of thirty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound, and fractions of a degree in proportion. The substitute, for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test, levies a tax of twenty-four one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound, instead of thirty-five one-thousandths, and it continues this duty of twenty-four one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound for every additional degree per polariscopic test. The existing law increases the polariscopic degree tax on all sugars above 16 Dutch standard in color and on all sugars which have gone through a process of refining to 1.90 of 1 cent per pound, this being virtually the tax upon sugars which really enter into consumption. Our substitute does not make this jump in favor of the refiner, but continues the uniform additional tax of twenty-four one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional and fractions of a degree in proportion for each additional degree per polariscopic test.

The existing law fixes a duty upon molasses, testing not above 40° of 20 per cent ad valorem. The substitute is 12 per cent ad valorem. The existing law upon molasses testing above 40° and not above 56° fixes a tax of 3 cents per gallon. Under our substitute the same quality of molasses would bear a duty of 1.8 cents per gallon. Upon molasses testing above 56° the existing law fixes a duty of 6 cents per gallon. The substitute fixes a tax of 3.6 cents per gallon.

Under the Payne-Aldrich bill maple sugar and maple sirup bear a tax of 4 cents per pound. In the substitute we propose a tax of 2.6 cents per pound.

Under the Payne-Aldrich bill glucose or grape sugar bear a tax of 1½ cents per pound. In the substitute the tax is 1 cent per pound.

Under the Payne-Aldrich bill sugar cane in its natural state, or unmanufactured, bears a tax of 20 per cent ad valorem. In the proposed substitute the duty is 17 per cent ad valorem.

Under the Payne-Aldrich bill sugar candy and all confectionery not otherwise specially provided for, valued at 15 cents per pound or less, and sugars after being refined, when tinctured, colored, or in any way adulterated, bear a tax of 4 cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem. In the bill offered by us we substitute for these rates 2.6 cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem. Under the Payne-Aldrich bill the same articles, valued at more than 15 cents per pound, bear a duty of 50 per cent ad valorem. We propose instead thereof a duty of 33⅓ per cent ad valorem.

Our reasons for preferring the substitute which we offer to the existing law are evident from the statement which we have made and, if our substitute shall become a law, will make it self-evident to every housekeeper and consumer of sugar in America.

Our reasons for preferring the substitute to H. R. 21213 are briefly as follows:

The tariff on sugar is peculiarly a revenue tariff. Very much the major part of the tax levied upon the consumer of sugars and sweets goes actually into the United States Treasury for the use and behoof and benefit of the American people. A minor part of the tax goes into the pockets of the producers. Upon numberless articles in the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill the duties are either prohibitive, or very nearly prohibitive, or highly exploitive, and in all these cases very much the major part of the tax levied upon the consumer goes into the pockets of the American producers, a special and favored class, and very scantily, and sometimes not at all, reaches the Treasury. In the next place the majority of the tariff schedules which have been adopted by the House and sent over to the Senate during this Congress make a reduction of about one-third. In the face of its record in connection with other bills the House reduced the duties upon sugars and the products of cane and sugar beets 100 per cent; in other words, entirely canceled the existing duties. It seemed to us that this was not in keeping with the promise of Democratic platforms to reduce present protective duties "gradually" toward and finally to a revenue basis. We have seen no reason why sugar should have been excepted from the general policy advocated by the Democratic Party and believed by us to be right.

Again, in levying an import duty upon sugar for revenue purposes, we are imitating the time-honored and time-justified precedents.

The abolition of the Dutch standard and of the differential, together with the reduction of duties upon refined sugar, will strike a serious blow against one of the great American trusts, which has not been scrupulous either in its dealings with the Government or with the people. We do not believe that the reduction of duties which we propose will seriously disturb any legitimate or fair business. We think the only effect will be to reduce excessive and undue profits made by sugar-beet factories, some of which have been enormous, while cheapening the product to the household.

With regard to cane sugar, the cost of the production of sugar from which is greater than the cost of the production of beet sugar, owing to the fact that the labor engaged in the production of beet sugar is intelligent, efficient white labor, and the labor engaged in the production of cane sugar is for the most part unintelligent and inefficient, there may accrue some disturbance to businesses not well equipped and not well managed, but none to any business well equipped and well managed.

That the reduction which we propose is a sufficient reduction our political antagonists confess by the fact that one faction of them does not propose any reduction at all and the other faction proposes a reduction much smaller than the substitute which we advocate makes.

We have not felt that it was wise to surrender fifty millions of public revenue at one swoop by putting sugar and sugar-cane and sugar-beet products upon the free list, especially in view of the fact that there exist numberless other import duties prohibitive in their character from which the people's Treasury does not procure any money at all, or else a negligible revenue, the practical operation of such taxes being to take money from the pockets of the consumer and put it into the pockets of the producers.

We feel confident that within a few years the duty which we propose will bring as much money into the Treasury as the duty now existing under the Payne-Aldrich tariff brings, owing to the cheapening of the product, the encouragement of its use, and the increase of the demand, and the increase of the importations to meet the demand.

We beg leave in this connection to make the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives to accompany H. R. 21213, in so far as the statistics and figures therein recited go, a part of this report and to have it published as Exhibit A herewith.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 2, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, we wait on Thee for Thy blessing, that we may be wise in our conceptions, pure in our motives, strong in our devotion to Thee and in the things which make for good in the relationships of life; in our homes that they may be sacred; in our country, which safeguards our homes, protects our inherent rights; in our religion, which holds us close to Thee in life and in death.

Again our hearts are touched by the removal of another Member of this body; he has answered the call which waits on us all—a typical American citizen who dignified labor by faithful service and was called by those who knew him best to serve them in the affairs of State and Nation. Make us faithful to the obligations resting upon us, that we may be prepared to go forward to the larger life without fear or doubting, and comfort those who knew and loved him, especially his wife and children, with bright hopes and anticipations for the continuance of his existence in another of the Father's many mansions, where they shall join him. And Thine be the praise forever. In the name of Him who taught us the immortality of the soul. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, May 29, 1913, was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—MARY BASYE.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mary Basye (H. R. 19651, 62d Cong., 3d sess.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 27, 1913.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: As required by section 19 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I have the honor to advise that a copy of the journal of the Executive Council of Porto Rico for the regular session of 1913 has been transmitted to you under separate cover.

Very respectfully, WOODROW WILSON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of the Hon. FORREST GOODWIN, late a Representative from the State of Maine.

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. GOODWIN at Skowhegan, Me.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And in compliance with the foregoing resolutions the Vice President had appointed as said committee Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. DILLINGHAM.

COMMITTEE ON ROADS.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the privileged resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 104 (H. Rept. 18).

Resolved, That Rule X of the Rules of the House of Representatives be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding immediately after paragraph 55 in section 1 thereof the following new paragraph, to wit:

"56. On roads, to consist of 21 members."

SEC. 2. That Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding immediately after paragraph 54 thereof the following new paragraph, to wit:

"54a. To matters relating to the construction or maintenance of roads, other than appropriations therefor; to the committee on roads: Provided, That it shall not be in order for any bill providing general legislation in relation to roads to contain any provision for any specific road, nor for any bill in relation to a specific road to embrace a provision in relation to any other specific road."

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the resolution speaks for itself. It provides for amending the rules so as to create a committee on roads consisting of 21 members. This committee is necessary on account of the growing importance of this subject. There are numerous bills that have been introduced in the House upon the subject of good roads, post roads, highways, etc. They have been referred to a half dozen or more different committees. It seemed to the Committee on Rules that the time had arrived when a committee should be created to be called the Committee on Roads, in order that all of these bills might be referred to that committee, where they can be deliberately and well considered. Therefore the resolution is reported to this House. We believe that it should be adopted and that the rules should be amended and that this important subject should have consideration at the hands of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain the exceptions which are noted in the resolution as regards what is germane in a good roads bill?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the resolution simply provides that the House may consider the proposition of good roads under a general system or scheme, and that no particular roadway shall be considered by the committee or by the House of Representatives.

Mr. MURDOCK. It seems to me that the resolution provided that no amendment should be offered as to a particular road on any general proposition. Is that true? Under the rules of the House that would not be in order, but does not the resolution itself so provide?

Mr. HENRY. The resolution does not provide that. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Texas takes his seat, I will ask him if he will yield?

Mr. HENRY. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas if this committee will in any way interfere with the duties of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

Mr. HENRY. I do not think that it will interfere with their duties. It may relieve them of some burdens that they do not care to undertake at this time. The resolution speaks for itself.

Mr. FOWLER. It is not intended in any way to take away from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads their jurisdiction over post roads?

Mr. HENRY. I do not think there is any such intention as that. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. The rule provides that all matters relating to the maintenance or construction of roads other than appropriations therefor shall be referred to the Committee on Roads. Suppose a bill is introduced in reference to the construction or maintenance of a road in one of the national parks, does that go to this committee?

Mr. HENRY. I could not hear the gentleman on account of the conversation surrounding me.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a bill is introduced in regard to the construction or maintenance of a road in one of the national parks, would that go to this committee?

Mr. HENRY. I hardly think it is intended it should take jurisdiction away from it. Of course that would be a matter of construction by the Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but I wanted to get the gentleman's idea as to what the intention of the committee was. I take it it would not relate to the construction or maintenance of a road in the District of Columbia outside of the city of Washington where we provide for roads in the District.

Mr. HENRY. That would be a matter of construction, but still if it did, I do not see that it would make any material difference.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is a matter of construction, but sometimes in enacting legislation or adopting rules it is desirable to know in advance what the purpose is so there will not be any controversy hereafter.

Mr. HENRY. It is not intended for that purpose at all.

Mr. MANN. With reference to the exception, which is that no bill in reference to a specific road shall embrace a provision in reference to any other specific road, does that apply to a case where a bill is introduced for half a dozen specific roads? Would it be possible to introduce a bill or have a bill reported that related to more than one specific road in one bill?

Mr. HENRY. The idea is to provide for a general scheme of legislation, if we have any legislation at all, in regard to roads.

Mr. MANN. Well, I understand the theory of it, but here is a provision——

Mr. HENRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will have 20 minutes' time on that side and there are several gentlemen to whom I have promised time and I desire to yield time——

Mr. MANN. I did not know that.

Mr. HENRY. Therefore I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves 13 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, before taking time myself I am ready to yield a little time to any gentleman in the House who is still a believer in the old doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty; who believes in that simple government which was advocated by the father of the Democratic Party, Thomas Jefferson, that the people in the townships were better judges of a road that should be built in a township than a bureau with its headquarters in Washington.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me five minutes? I entertain that view. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] is still a believer that the people of a township are better able to take care of their own roads on their own initiative?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I emphatically believe in that, and I would like to have five minutes to explain it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand—yet I do not desire to spring anything on the House—I understand that the gentleman from Missouri is slated for the chairmanship of this new committee which Thomas Jefferson never dreamed would be created during the history of the Republic of which he was one of the founders.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want to say to the gentleman that I concur very thoroughly in the view that he has expressed. The gentleman stated he wanted to yield some time to people who believed that way. When he has finished his own remarks I will be glad if he will yield me five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I will say I have some doubt about the genuineness of the gentleman from Missouri believing in that old doctrine and the——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not just now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague [Mr. MURDOCK]?

Mr. CAMPBELL. For a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Along the line that the gentleman has been pursuing, would the gentleman oppose a proposition that the people of a given county determine by vote what road should be improved first by Government aid?

Mr. CAMPBELL. On the contrary, I favor just that sort of thing.

Mr. MURDOCK. I thought not, judging from the query which my colleague put to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, no. I stated that if there was anybody left in the House on the Democratic side who still believed that the people in the townships were better judges of the roads that should be improved and the manner in which they should be improved than a bureau in Washington I was ready to yield him some time to advocate that policy.

Mr. MURDOCK. And, as I understand the gentleman, he would favor the proposition of the people of a given county determining what roads should be improved first?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Undoubtedly; although I have always subscribed myself as a political follower of Alexander Hamilton rather than of Thomas Jefferson. Alexander Hamilton believed in a government from Washington, while Thomas Jefferson believed that they could be better governed from Walnut Grove Township than from Washington. But as the years have come and gone the country is veering toward Hamilton's view of government, and one condition of life after another is being turned over to the bureaus in Washington rather than being left in the hands of the people themselves. Just now——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Just now we are embarking on other propositions hitherto left with the local governments. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MOORE. We are about to spend $50,000,000 on good roads in Pennsylvania, raised from the taxpayers of that State. Does the gentleman think the appointment of this new committee would make it fair for us to distribute that $50,000,000 amongst the other States of the Union who desire to have good roads?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I presume that this committee, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] is to be chairman, will designate when they report in a bill or proposed law the manner in which the funds raised in Pennsylvania shall be applied, and I hope that they will use some of it in Walnut Grove Township, in Neosho County, Kans. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Well, New York State also has raised $50,000,000 for good roads to be constructed in that State. Does the gentleman think it would be wise to refer to this committee the distribution of the money raised by New York for the construction of roads among other States which do not have so much money and where there are many more roads to be improved?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not opposed to the inauguration of this new method of constructing roads. I still say that I believe in the old doctrine of Hamilton, but I would not take off the speed limit. I would not go to the length that it is proposed to go in this resolution. It is proposed by this resolution to create a committee that will say exactly what roads shall be built, and you can not amend their bills on the floor of the House. The roads may be built in Pennsylvania, or in New York, where the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] says the money is to be raised with which the roads are to be built. But, on the other hand, the roads may be provided by the bill for Kansas and Missouri, and in that event there may be some benefit accruing to Kansas and Missouri.

Mr. MOORE. But is not the proposition now before us in regard to postal roads that we shall improve the postal roads throughout the country at public expense, whereas, so far as any postal roads within the limits of any of the large municipalities are concerned, they shall receive no national consideration at all?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Undoubtedly; but this proposition goes far beyond that. It does not limit the construction of roads to roads for postal and military purposes. This simply says that the bars are down, and from this time on roads shall be constructed in every township in the United States at the expense of the Federal Treasury, whether they are to be used for military or postal purposes or not. The time is past when roads are to be built only for post roads and military roads.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Would it not be an improvement on this resolution to refer the whole matter to the promoters of this business—the builders of automobiles throughout the United States—who are the pioneers of this movement and its practical promoters? Would not that be a better plan than to have a committee appointed from the membership of the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL. This resolution has already been favorably reported.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that there has been an expression from the Committee on Rules, who, of course, have investigated this subject. As far as I am concerned, I would not appoint any committee. I would not have the Government go into the business of building the roads. Why, even in our State of New York, under a good Democratic administration, it is impossible to keep corruption out of the building of State roads on the scale of $100,000,000. Now, when we get to spending billions of dollars in the United States for roads all over the country, I think that corruption might grow. I say there has been corruption in our State, because, without a change of politics or administration, but simply a change in officers, it is flatly charged and does not seem to be denied. I am against the whole scheme. I think that the United States have enough business to attend to, and that the roads should be built by the States, in localities determined by the localities, and looked after by local superintendence and afterwards repaired by local superintendence. Up to the time of two and a half years ago we made very satisfactory progress in the State of New York in building roads. The work was progressive then.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. POU. I was going to ask the gentleman if he did not think, inasmuch as up to this time we have spent $620,000,000 in digging out rivers and harbors, and have dumped a good many millions of money into New York Harbor and Philadelphia Harbor, that it is time we were doing something for roads out in Walnut Grove Township?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think so. I am heartily in favor of it; but I want to call attention to this further fact, that while we have severed our relations with the doctrine of State sovereignty on the Democratic side of the House this resolution has ignored another fact. As soon as the Democratic Party came in we were going to economize; we were going to save money for the people in the administration of the Government.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CAMPBELL. I can not yield for a moment. Does any gentleman on the Democratic side of the House who participates in the responsibility for raising the revenue and for disbursing it have any idea of the amount of money that will be called for out of the Treasury of the United States by this resolution? Why, billion-dollar Congresses will come and go, and we will be going into the billion and a half. And we are here inaugurating one of the most expensive policies that the Government has ever undertaken, and that within three months after the inauguration of a Democratic administration that was pledged to economy in government.

Mr. POU. Is not the gentleman in favor of it, as he has just said?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, certainly. I have never posed in opposition to the Federal authority, and I have never posed in opposition to appropriations out of the Treasury of the United States, because I have always been in favor of a policy that in time of peace would raise enough revenue to defray all the expenses of the Government, including the improvement of rivers and harbors and such improvements as we might want to make in roads; but gentlemen on that side are not in favor of policies which will produce revenue, while they seem to be in favor of policies that will exhaust more revenue than we will be able to supply the Treasury with.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat I will ask him, When was this resolution considered in committee?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Finally this morning.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain what was the origin of the proviso in the amendment to Rule XI? The proviso is as follows:

Provided, That it shall not be in order for any bill providing general legislation in relation to roads to contain any provision for any specific road, nor for any bill in relation to a specific road to embrace a provision in relation to any other specific road.

What is the basis for that sort of exception?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will have to remind my colleague that I am a minority member of the Committee on Rules, and I will refer him to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] or to some of his Democratic colleagues who are responsible for this resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman was present during the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, yes; but I am not responsible for the inspiration of the resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. I thought that perhaps the gentleman from Kansas had elicited some information while sitting as a member of that committee. Evidently, as a matter of fact, he did not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not get that information. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has asked why some of these exceptions were placed in this bill. I was in favor of having these exceptions placed there because I had not in mind doing anything that they are intended to cut off. We have had an example before us of a pork-barrel bill in the shape of a public-building bill, and it was intended here to cut off any such legislation as that in relation to roads. It was intended that if a bill was brought in containing general provisions for the construction and maintenance of roads that Members would not be permitted to load it down with specific roads. We all know the vice of omnibus-bill legislation, and the purpose of these two exceptions to which the gentleman from Kansas has called attention is to make it impossible to have any logrolling or an omnibus bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I understand this rule would permit reporting of a bill similar to the road provision that was put in the Post Office bill last winter—general legislation—but it does not and would not permit the coupling of two specific road propositions in any one bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is the idea—to prevent logrolling by an omnibus bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to suggest an amendment. After the word "roads," in line 12, insert "except roads in military reservations, forest reserves, national parks, and in the District of Columbia." Roads of the character indicated are not contemplated by this rule, and yet, unless there be some definite statement as to what the purpose is, it may result in controversy hereafter. In the District of Columbia at present the roads and the streets in the outlying district are authorized by the District Committee as a part of the municipal development, and the payment is half and half.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This rule was not intended to include that in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not in mind a bill proposing a highway between two points which would run through a reservation. Perhaps the word "wholly" should go in, so that it would read "except roads wholly within the national parks," and so forth, because roads are being built continually within these reservations that are clearly a part of the internal development and essential features of them, and would not at all interfere with the general plan contemplated in this rule.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It could not do that. Mr. Speaker, there are three kinds of roads Congress may build, and it was intended to get them all before one committee. Congress has the power to build military roads, post roads, and a great many contend that it would have power to build roads in order to aid the regulation of interstate commerce. Now, in order that there might be no wild schemes, for there are bills in which they might start out in some other committee to build military roads——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest to the gentleman that I would add to my amendment the words "wholly within the reservation."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This will not interfere with that for another reason.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman believes that the wording of the rule is so couched as not to interfere with such roads and makes that statement, I think it will be sufficient.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is not intended that the wording here should cover what the gentleman suggested. The bill, as far as I am concerned, has in mind general legislation in a very modest form.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to suggest another amendment, if the gentleman will permit, by striking out the period and inserting a comma and the following language——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest this amendment: Strike out the period at the end of the rule, insert a comma, and add the following language:

Nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules for the consideration of such a bill, nor shall the Committee on Rules report a rule making such a motion in order or providing for the consideration of such a bill.

Unless these two provisions are contained in the rule, the experience of the House is that it will not be possible, though perhaps it may be in the immediate future, to prevent omnibus bills. The omnibus bill, which is the worst character of legislation, is usually made up in such a way as to insure the support of two-thirds of the House.

Pressure is brought to bear upon the Speaker to give recognition for a motion to suspend the rules, and a petition is usually presented to him containing the names of two-thirds of the Members of the House. The only effective way to prevent the omnibus bill is to include in the rule a prohibition against entertaining such a motion, as well as a limitation upon the Rules Committee either to make such a motion in order or to make possible the consideration of an omnibus bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question, for information. Was the gentleman offering this as an amendment or just talking about offering it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am talking about it in the hope that I may be given permission to offer it as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask unanimous consent for that privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me put the request. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment which I have just read.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. The gentleman from Texas has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the gentleman from Texas purposes asking unanimous consent to extend the time five minutes on each side?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will yield the gentleman from Illinois two minutes of my time.

Mr. MANN. I may yield back part of my time.

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman finds that he needs more time, I think I can spare it to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized for three minutes, and yield back two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, after all, as we move along in civilization, it becomes necessary for statesmen to take into consideration new conditions and the ability of the people to make improvements. Every great nation must at all times be engaged in the construction of some great public works. We have constructed harbors, deepened rivers, put up defenses, built forts, great public buildings, and in almost every direction the Government has been engaged in carrying on some great public work. I believe the time has come when the Government of the United States has both the money and the ability, as well as the desire, to see that public roads throughout the country shall be better improved than they have been in the past [applause], and I welcome a rule which undertakes to commit the Government not to an extravagant system of road building, not to wild-eyed ideas of governmental interference with local affairs, but which undertakes to commit the Government through supervision and aid to the construction of permanent good roads throughout the country where they may be most necessary.

I am glad that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], who had much to do undoubtedly with the drafting of this rule, has succeeded in having the rule reported to the House. I do not anticipate that my own constituency or the roads in my district will ever receive much, if any, direct benefit from the construction of these new roads, but I believe that the people in the great cities are willing to give their aid and money and their wisdom, such as they have, to the construction of permanent good roads throughout the Union, so that the people may be better able to travel and carry their produce to market. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I only want time to call attention to what seems to me to be an utter inconsistency in the present attitude of the two old parties represented in this body. We have had during the history of the Democratic Party adherence to a fundamental principle opposing any action by the Nation in so far as concerned matters which by the broadest use of the imagination might be termed State and local affairs. Madison and Monroe, when Democratic Presidents, vetoed bills which would be covered under this resolution as proposed. Jefferson opposed vigorously internal improvements by the Government, and yet we have to-day a Democratic House supporting and favoring a resolution which means that the Nation shall take charge of these things which have hitherto been considered local.

More than that, we have had on the other side of this House one distinguished gentleman, the gentleman from New York, who is opposed fundamentally, as he says, to any aid of this kind on the part of the Nation for roads throughout the States. We have had another distinguished leader of the Republican Party expressing himself in favor of national aid—showing the chaotic conditions in the leadership of that party. I want to read just a line or two from the Republican platform of 1908, where it goes on record in favor of this proposition:

The Republican Party during the last 12 years has accomplished extraordinary work in bringing the resources of the National Government to the aid of the farmer, not only in advancing agriculture itself but in increasing the conveniences of rural life. We recognize the social and economic advantages of good country roads, maintained more and more largely at public expense and less and less at the expense of the abutting property owner. In this work we commend the growing practice of State aid, and we approve the efforts of the National Agricultural Department by experiment and otherwise to make clear to the public the best methods of road construction.

The original distinction between the two parties is reversed to-day on the floor of this House. I just want to suggest the point that we have come to a time in the history of this Nation where there should be a dividing line based on principles instead of interests.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. In just a moment. I would like to say there is a party in existence which bases its policies on a fundamental issue, on the issue that the Nation is an entity, that it is not a combination of 48 sovereign Commonwealths, but is a Nation whose full powers may justly be used and must be used for the advancement of the common welfare.

The situation here to-day is an instance of the absurdities which have for years followed politics based on selfish interests and not on fundamental principles.

The two old parties have become organizations with meaningless names, for under their rival banners are leaders who catch at passing pretexts to obtain power and make no attempt to base a program on broad and essential principles.

The individualistic State rights idea of the Democratic Party originally, which considered government as an evil and its only duty that of punishing crime and keeping order, has completely broken down. This resolution proves that fact, if any further proof had been needed. But still there are many members of the party in this body who will support this resolution, but will not accept the principle involved. They will vote in the future against measures having exactly the same purpose as this one, putting national questions in the hands of the National Government.

The progressive movement in this country to-day does not fear a centralized government when the people control it. It considers national legislation for the good of all not paternalistic measures, but simply instances of the principle of self-help, the imposition of laws upon the people by the people themselves.

The Progressives favor this good-roads proposal, not as an unrelated issue, forced by public sentiment, but as a part of a logical, consistent program, based on the principle that the only end of a just government is the public good and that the National Government is the proper authority to deal with questions which concern all the people of the Nation.

I congratulate the Democratic Party on its stand in this matter and hope that the majority which intends to pass this resolution will stand true on their principle of to-day when other measures come up by which the common welfare may be advanced by the action of the National Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kansas has two minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas has five.

Mr. HENRY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I just want to answer the observation of the last gentleman who addressed the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. The gentleman evidently is not acquainted with Democratic principles and its party platforms or he would not have made the statement which he has made this morning. For instance, in the Democratic platform of 1912 we find this language:

> We favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have that right in my hand and——

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought from the gentleman's remarks he had not read it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. But is it not a fact that the plank is a fundamental contradiction of Democratic theory?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all. There has never been a Democratic administration and I think there has never been a Democratic President who did not favor——

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. But Madison and Monroe both vetoed——

Mr. HARDWICK. So far as Government aid to post roads is concerned, there has never been any Democratic objection; but, to the contrary, I want to state to the gentleman in 1912, and in 1908 for that matter, although it is not important in 1908, the Democratic Party has consistently stood for Government aid for the post roads of the country, and if the gentleman will study the Democratic platforms he will find that there is no need whatever for the Progressive Party in order for the people to get good roads. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kansas has two minutes remaining.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Texas yield me a couple of minutes?

Mr. HENRY. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in the midst of all the enthusiasm over this extension of Federalism it is not a pleasant office to be the one to voice opposition to it. But I do want, in the very brief time I have, to insist that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] shall not burden the memory of Alexander Hamilton or any doctrine taught by him with responsibility for legislation of this character. It is possible, though I have not been fully convinced of it from a reading of his works, that Hamilton did not have that trust of the people which he ought to have had and which we have in these days. That he did believe profoundly in our system of government, with its sovereign States, in which the people care for local matters, is true beyond all question.

This is a wonderful illustration of the compelling power of an appropriation. In the years that I have been a Member of this body I have noticed our Democratic friends rising in their places whenever opportunity offered to declare their undying allegiance to the doctrine of State rights, always to desert that position in the face of an appropriation, present or prospective.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this legislation because I am of the opinion—and I voice that opinion as something of a Federalist and something of a Hamiltonian, if you please—that it is impossible for the Federal Government to embark upon a broad policy of national road building and to carry out that policy in a fair, just, and equitable manner. I believe it is another and a questionable step in the direction of breaking down the very proper line established by the fathers between the powers and responsibilities and duties of the Federal Government and the sovereignty of the people within the States.

I believe in good roads as profoundly as any man that lives, but I believe those roads should be built by the people locally, with State aid, and that they should always remain under their control. I shall regret the day, which is sure to come with the passage of this legislation, when Federal authority shall be established within the States over public highways. But it is inevitable, it is said, possibly as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests—and I realize how carefully he has studied the matter—this is a movement that the people are insistent upon and demand; and therefore is inevitable. But in that event I can not but feel that it is regrettable, because with an expenditure of Federal money there must necessarily follow Federal control over the highways within the States, the extension of Federal police power, and the extension of the control of Federal authorities over many matters that should remain in the control of the people locally.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, as I realize the resolution will pass, that we shall, at least, be reasonable and sensible in our legislation under it. I really feel that we shall be best off the less the new committee shall do beyond that encouragement which the National Government may very properly give to expenditures by State and local authorities.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has one minute.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, Congress has the power to extend national aid to good roads under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and the authority to build military highways and to establish post roads. Jefferson thought so, Madison thought so, and so did Calhoun. There is no question about the power of Congress in the premises. The Democratic Party has inserted a provision in its platform favoring it and proposes to keep faith with the American people, not only on this pledge, but also all other pledges we have made. Therefore I hope this resolution will be promptly adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. EDWARDS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Respectfully, DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing the eloquent and patriotic speech that was delivered on Decoration Day by the Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN, of Alabama, at Gettysburg.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

TEN THOUSAND HEAR ELOQUENT ADDRESS OF J. THOMAS HEFLIN—ORATION BY ALABAMA CONGRESSMAN FEATURES MEMORIAL DAY CELEBRATION—VETERANS OF TWO WARS IN PARADE—ELOQUENT SOUTHERNER STIRS AUDIENCE BY PATRIOTIC ADDRESS.

GETTYSBURG, May 30, 1913.

Ten thousand people gathered at Gettysburg to-day for the annual Memorial Day observance.

Standing on historic Gettysburg battle field and bringing "a message of a reunited country," Representative J. THOMAS HEFLIN, of Alabama, to-day paid eloquent tribute to the heroism of the men who wore the blue and the gray. His was the first address ever delivered by a southerner at Gettysburg Memorial Day exercises.

Mr. HEFLIN spoke as follows:

"My countrymen, it was an important day when our fathers, for conscience sake, determined to leave the mother country. It was a kindly light that led them from the persecution and tyranny of the Old World into the pleasing possibilities of the new. Their dogged determination to better their condition, their love of religious liberty, and their willingness to do and dare for the right was splendid material with which to build a republic. They seemed to hear the voice of one crying in this wilderness of the west saying, 'This is the land and here the opportunity for building a genuine republic; prepare ye the way.' The hardships and suffering that they endured, their heroic deeds and daring exploits, testify how well and how faithfully they prepared the way. When we look back over the path that our liberty has come we do not see her winding through labyrinthian shades of ease and luxury, but we behold her coming up through human sacrifice and heroic suffering, through death to life. King rule died in the thirteen Colonies, and this Republic of the west was born. The first sound that fell upon its infant ears was that of the soldiers' tread, the roar of musketry, and the thunder of artillery. Our colonial fathers from North and South and East and West fought together when they brought this Republic into being. They defended it together in the War of 1812; they triumphed together when they carried the Stars and Stripes into the heritage of the Montezumas.

ANOTHER GREAT BATTLE.

"But, my friends, there was another great battle to be fought before the unmistakable status of the Union was finally fixed. It was the conflict of internal ideas and forces—the final and crucial test of the Republic's strength and durability. The combat took place on the field of battle in the War between the States. The right of the State to secede and the right of the Union to prevent it; the status of rights and relationship between State and Federal Government had to be settled once and for all time. This question could not be determined in the councils of peace; it had to be settled by the arbitrament of the sword. Dr. Ellis, a northern man, in his history of our country, says truly that the question of secession was never authoritatively settled until the war settled it.

"Hope's precious pearl in sorrow's cup
Unmelted at the bottom lay,
To shine again when all drunk up
And the bitterness should pass away.

"So the Republic, once abounding with conflicting opinions as to rights and powers belonging to State and Federal Government, is to-day the harmonious household of sovereign States—the home of a brave and happy people. Here we bow with solemn reverence in honor of our Nation's dead; here we pay to their blessed memory the tribute of our united love. Heroism never had truer representatives than those who made this battlefield immortal. Here the soldier in blue and the soldier in gray read in each other's eyes courage born of convictions—devotion to principle—and a willingness to do and to die for what they believed to be right. Here the soldier in gray met a foeman worthy of his steel, and here the soldier in blue met as brave a warrior as ever shouldered a gun or drew a battle blade. Here Union and Confederate soldiers by their daring sacrifices and heroism, challenged the admiration of the world. Here northern valor drew up in battle line the bravest of her brave, the noblest specimens of her patriotic manhood, and here southern chivalry marshaled the flower of her army, the noblest types of her splendid citizenship.

CHECKED THE MARCH.

"Here the brave Union soldier checked the march of the hitherto irresistible Confederate soldier; here the tide of the war was turned; and here, many contend, the decisive battle was fought. Here fought and fell the heroic representatives of the two bravest armies that ever crossed the fields of carnage or battled for what they believed to be right. Here both armies fought for the right as God gave them power to see it. Here in the red glare of destructive battle fire two mighty lessons were taught, one that the Union should be preserved, and the other that the Union should be ever mindful and considerate of the rights of the States. Here the Union soldier died that the Union might live, and here the Confederate soldier in his death put a stress and emphasis on constitutional powers and limitations that will live while the Republic lasts and human liberty endures. So, my friends, the soldiers of the two armies who baptized this soil with their blood did not die in vain. Here with their blood they started the work of cementing the bonds of an everlasting union, for it seems that the fates decreed after this battle that the bonds thus cemented with the mingled blood of brothers North and South should never be torn asunder. Fifty years have come and gone since Gettysburg received her baptism of blood. Here death claimed a fearful toll from the ranks of both armies; here mother earth drank alike the blood of the victor and the vanquished; and here in this hallowed battle-ground sleep the knightly warriors of the blue and the gray while above their dreamless dust floats the Stars and Stripes—the loved flag of a reunited people. No fair-minded American can listen to the story of the Battle of Gettysburg without a deep feeling of reverence and admiration for the heroes of both armies who fought or died in battle here.

MESSAGE OF GOOD WILL.

"I bring to you a message of good will and fellowship from the people of the South. We honor the memory of the soldier who wore the gray and we honor with you the memory of the soldier who wore the blue.

"As an evidence of our recognition and appreciation of the valor and heroism of both Union and Confederate soldiers and as a token of the spirit of fraternal love now permeating the hearts of our people, I bring these floral offerings from the flower gardens of Dixie, one for the grave of the soldier in blue and the other for the grave of the soldier in gray.

"When I recall the deeds of daring done here—the acts of undaunted courage and heroism—I declare to you that the sublime valor of the heroes of both armies is the priceless heritage of all. In the month of July the survivors of the two armies who battled at Gettysburg will meet in friendly reunion here. A half hundred years have gone since they looked into each other's faces. The bugle has long since sung truce to them. Together they behold the bow of peace in the bended heavens, and together they look upon the flag of our Union as it blossoms with the stars of reunited States. These war-tested veterans are no more divided into hostile camps, no longer arrayed on opposing sides. Their guns have been beaten into the implements of peace, and against each other they shall know war no more. My friends, what a glorious reunion that will be. The angels will smile upon that gathering, and the God of our fathers will bless and approve it.

THE FINAL DECREE.

"The South accepted in good faith the final decree of the sword. When the brave remnant of Lee's army stacked their guns at Appomattox Gen. Lee plighted to the Union not only his faith, but the faith of every Confederate soldier and his son, their children and their children's children, through all the years and generations to come. When bleeding Cuba was smitten sore with the rod of Spanish tyranny and lifted her pitiful pleading eyes in hope to the Stars and Stripes, I saw the old soldier of the blue and the old soldier of the gray and their sons bivouacked around the same camp fire and marshaled beneath the same flag. I saw Fighting Joe Wheeler, of Confederate fame, and Gen. Shafter, of the Union Army; Fitzhugh Lee, the nephew of Robert E. Lee, and Frederick Grant, the son of the Union general to whom Gen. Lee surrendered at Appomattox, all grouped beneath Old Glory's sacred folds in the War with Spain; and I said in my heart, 'Land of our fathers, through thy length and breadth a tremor passes; look, the dark is done, and on thy proud form shines the splendor of the sun; thine own children with heads erect and light on all their faces are happy in the blessings and benefits of a reunited country.' With love for our living and tears for our dead, we put behind us the things that divided us once and glory in the beauty and strength of the Union ties that bind us together now. This, thank God, is our country, ours to love and cherish, ours to guard against evils from within, and ours to defend against dangers from without. Let the heroic dead of the War between the States—the blue and the gray—sleep each in the mellow moonlight of his own proud memories. Let the living join hands and hearts about a common center for the good of the Republic. Let North and South and East and West all work together for the good of each and each for the good of all.

"Rich in the heritage of history, proud of her splendid present, and happy in the rosy promise of a glorious future, the South consecrated in the loves, traditions, and incidents of a chivalrous people reconsecrates her heart, her strength, and her all to the highest and best interest of our common country. She will guard with intrepid vigilance the civic life and honor of the State and follow faithfully wherever Old Glory bares her beauty to the breeze. America, incarnated spirit of liberty! Our hearts and our hopes are all with thee. Here as the dove of peace bearing the olive branch of love and loyalty circles above the living and the dead, let us pray the God of our fathers to sanctify this feeling of fraternal love and fellowship to the everlasting good and glory of the Republic. Here on this battle field; incarnadined with the blood of patriots North and patriots South, let us in the language spoken by the immortal Lincoln at Gettysburg 50 years ago resolve that this Government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth. Let us here declare anew that the welfare of the citizen is the highest end and aim of constitutional government. Let us strive to make our Government so good and pure and just that every heart will love it and every hand defend it. Let me, in conclusion, employ the language of the loved and lamented Grady, of Georgia, 'Let us resolve to crown the miracles of our past with the spectacle of a Republic compact, united, indissoluble in the bonds of love—loving, from the Lakes to the Gulf, the wounds of war healed in every heart as on every hill, serene and resplendent at the summit of human achievement and earthly glory, blazing out the path and making clear the way up which all the nations of the earth must come in God's appointed time.'"

HETCH HETCHY.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain resolutions which I have received from five different chambers of commerce in the San Joaquin Valley, in the State of California, protesting against a certain bill that is pending by which it is sought to divert the waters of Hetch Hetchy and Lake Eleanor to San Francisco for domestic purposes, the resolutions claiming that the water should be used for irrigation purposes on the plains below.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE RULES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. HENRY] to the fact that the resolution adopted this morning increases the number of subsections and disarranges the order of the numbering, and authority ought to be given to renumber them.

Mr. HENRY. I was going to ask unanimous consent, and I now ask unanimous consent, that the rules be so renumbered as to conform to this change.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the subsections of Rule XI be so renumbered as to conform to the change which has been made. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Texas that there were some changes made the other day, and if he is going to change the numbering he ought to change it so as to conform to all the changes.

Mr. HENRY. That is what I intend—to change all those numbers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that because of the changes made the other day and the change made to-day the subsections be renumbered in conformity with those changes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ROADS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand that a number of bills have been introduced which ought to go to the newly created Committee on Roads.

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of that after the committees are appointed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There are quite a number of bills that ought to be referred to this committee.

Mr. MANN. Let us not take that up this morning. We have not the time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois suggests that the matter be disposed of after the committees are appointed.

Mr. MANN. I say we have not time this morning. There is a Democratic caucus at 2 o'clock, and the gentleman from Washing [Mr. HUMPHREY] is to have an hour.

The SPEAKER. That can be disposed of in the next morning hour.

THE FOREST SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order heretofore adopted, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday I introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of the Forest Service, and it is upon that resolution that I wish to speak to-day.

I want to make the statement in the beginning that it is not my purpose to criticize the men who are now connected with the Forest Service or any of the men who have been connected with the Forest Service in the past. I think they have acted in about the way that the ordinary man would have acted under the circumstances, and I am not impugning their motives. What I want to talk about to-day is the system.

I was one man from the far West that favored the creation of the forest reserves. It is with sincere regret that I have been forced to the conclusion that their creation and administration have been the greatest public wrong ever permitted in the history of this country. I believed, when I favored this policy, that the purpose of a forest reserve was to protect and increase the timber supply of the United States for the benefit of the public. Like most people, I was ignorant enough to suppose that a forest reserve would have timber upon it. What are the facts?

One-third of the entire area of the 160 forest reserves has no forest upon it, never has, and never will have. Millions of acres of the so-called forest reserves are sheep and cattle pastures of little value. Millions of acres are barren sand dunes, treeless deserts, and sagebrush plains, absolutely worthless for any purpose. But if the only thing to criticize was that the forest reserves had no forests upon them, that we are paying several millions dollars a year to care for these worthless lands, and that it has cost the United States two dollars for every dollar's worth of timber that has been sold off of these forest reserves, then I would not now take the time of the House to speak of it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will ask the gentleman if he will not wait until a later time, when I will have no objection to yielding for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Right at that point I want to ask one brief question. The gentleman stated the amount of treeless forest reserves. I assume that his statement does not apply to his own State, but that he is speaking generally.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am speaking generally, of the forest reserves in the whole country.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand it, the reserves in the gentleman's State are mostly forested country.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Most of them are, although some of them are not.

We were told, and I think that most of us believed, that the purpose of the establishment of the national forests was, first, to save to all the people the forests that remained upon the public domain; second, to prevent a monopoly of the timber supply by powerful private interests; third, to give to the people of the United States cheap forest products. What has been the result, and in how far has this promise been kept?

I assert the following: First, the Forest Service has been largely responsible for the great timber monopoly in the West. Second, it has always worked from the very beginning, and is still working, in the interests of the railroads by permitting them to acquire large tracts of the public domain and by vastly increasing their holdings. Third, it has given to the railroads directly, without money and without price, millions of acres of the best timbered lands in the United States. Fourth, it is to-day more largely responsible for the high cost of forest products than any other one cause. Fifth, in the name of conservation it annually keeps millions of dollars' worth of timber off the market and permits it to rot in the forests.

DISTRIBUTION OF TIMBER.

Speaking in general terms, one-half of all the standing timber in the United States is in California, Oregon, and Washington. One-fourth of this amount is in forest reserves; one-fourth is owned by the railroads and the Weyerhaeuser syndicate; the rest by smaller private owners. How did these people get their vast holdings? It is a most interesting story, in which the Forest Service has played the leading part. The Weyerhaeuser syndicate secured most of its timber from the railroads. How did the railroads get theirs? In two ways. First, a part of the railroad lands came by Government land grants given for the building of these roads. Whether the vast domain that was given for this purpose was wisely given it is now too late to discuss. Many of the leading men thought so at that time and many believe so to-day. In any event, there was some consideration for giving this land to the railroads. Second, a mighty empire, consisting of millions of acres of land, has been given to the railroads practically for no consideration by the Forest Service, in the name of conservation, by what is known as the lieu-land system. It is this last proposition that I wish to discuss, and I hope that, as there are many Members of this body who believe as I once believed, that these forest reserves have been established and conducted in the interests of the public, and that they have not been run as private enterprises to glorify certain bureaus and departments and for the benefit of the railroads, they will for a few moments listen to the facts that I am going to present.

I reiterate that millions of acres of the most valuable of all our public domain has been given to the railroads in the name of "conservation." How was this done? The story is written in the records of the Government and there can be no dispute as to the facts. Why these facts have not been exploited it is not hard to understand.

In an evil hour Congress passed what is known as the lieu-land law as applied to forest reserves. Congress gave to the President the power to create forest reserves. Congress gave to the Secretary of the Interior the power to exchange land in forest reserves, acre for acre, for any unappropriated land in the United States. Congress supposed that this law would be used in behalf of the public. The cry of those who were clamoring for forest reserves was that the timber supply of the United States must be saved from monopoly. It was with this motto that they commenced to administer the lieu-land law and create forest reserves. What did they do under the pretense of acting in the interest of the people under this law which Congress had so unwisely placed upon the statute books? It is the most amazing story in the Nation's life. The facts that I shall use are taken from public documents, except where I indicate that they are taken from other sources.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will wait until I have finished this particular subject.

Mr. MONDELL. It is in line of the lieu-land proposition that I desire to address my question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will withhold his question for a little while, I will be obliged.

By Executive order vast forest reserves were created in Arizona. Of course, we know now that these forest reserves were almost entirely treeless and some of them completely so. At first these reserves did not include much railroad land. But the Forest Service was dissatisfied with this condition, and again by Executive order about 1,200,000 acres of land belonging to the Santa Fe Railroad were included in these treeless forest reserves. Immediately thereafter great agitation was commenced by the railroads and the Forest Service for an exchange of these lands for other lands outside of the reserve. The Secretary of the Interior suggested, first, that the railroads should take an equal area of public lands within these reserves, and this would give both the railroad and the Government their lands in solid bodies. This the railroad refused.

The Secretary then offered to exchange outside lands of equal value anywhere in the United States. This proposition the railroad again promptly rejected. It may be well to recall that at this opportune and critical time Mr. Paul Morton was one of the great powers in the Santa Fe Railroad; that he had great influence in "conservation" circles. He was himself a great "conservationist." In one of these reserves, called the San Francisco Mountain Reserve, there were included 935,000 acres of land belonging to the Santa Fe Railroad. This land was practically useless for any purpose, most of it being unfit even for sheep pasture. It was barren deserts and sand dunes, containing only sagebrush and cactus, inhabited only by coyotes and jack rabbits, centipedes and tarantulas, rattlesnakes and lizards. Eight hundred thousand acres of this land were valued by the railroads themselves at from 5 to 15 cents per acre. The railroads insisted that they be permitted to trade this land, acre for acre, for the best land that still remained in all the public domain. They made this offer, and in spite of the protest of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and in spite of the fact that the Secretary of the Interior had twice recommended against the proposition it was accepted, with the single restriction that 180,000 acres of the 935,000 should be located south of the thirty-seventh standard parallel of latitude and south of the Tehichipa Range of mountains; and under this contract, urged by the Forest Service, consummated in the name of conservation, for this vast, worthless, treeless waste, the Santa Fe Railroad selected 750,000 acres of the very best of all the public lands in the Republic. These selections were made with great care in 22 different States. The very cream of the public domain everywhere was secured. I have traced 53,000 acres of this selection to the State of Washington, although the Santa Fe Railroad does not own and never has owned a rail within 800 miles of that State. In the 53,000 acres in the State of Washington is found to-day some of the finest timbered land upon this globe. The Bureau of Corporations, in its recent report, says that some of this land thus received for nothing by the Santa Fe Railroad is worth from $100 to $200 per acre for the timber alone. The 53,000 acres secured in the State of Washington alone are worth many times what the entire 935,000 acres originally owned by the railroad is worth. The history of this Nation up to that hour contains no transaction that compares in disregard of all rights of the public with this transaction in making this princely gift to the Santa Fe Railroad.

At the instigation of Mr. Morton and the other officers of the Santa Fe Railroad, they were permitted to select for those 935,000 acres, absolutely worthless, 935,000 acres of the best public land beneath the flag. That is true. That is taken from the records, and I challenge any man to dispute it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman deny in that connection that after that transaction was made a bill passed through this Congress, in the last days of Congress, on March 3, 1905, validating that arrangement upon the part of Secretary of the Interior, and that the gentleman permitted it to pass without any objection at that time upon his part?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know whether that occurred or not.

Mr. MURDOCK. The RECORD shows that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Whether that is true or not, why did not the gentleman from Kansas raise his voice? He was here. Whether I voted for it or whether I voted against it does not change the facts. If I voted for it, I did exactly what the gentleman from Kansas did. I did not know what I was voting for, and I want to know whether the gentleman from Kansas will have the courage to denounce it now, as I do after I have discovered the truth?

Mr. MURDOCK. I certainly do denounce it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I am the author of the bill repealing the lieu-land law.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am going to discuss that further on.

Mr. MONDELL. My recollection is that after the bill passed the House repealing the lieu-land law in toto it was nearly nine months before it passed the Senate, and it became necessary to either have the lieu-land law remain on the statute books, so that exchanges could be made everywhere, or accept Secretary Hitchcock's agreement.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the gentleman will remember that the proviso was added by the managers of the House in conference.

Mr. MONDELL. It was not added by the managers of the House at all.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield any further at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HEFLIN). The gentleman from Washington declines to yield further.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Grand Canyon Forest Reserve was created in Arizona. This reserve contained 375,000 acres of Santa Fe land also. These 375,000 acres were also mostly worthless. But in the name of conservation, and with the active assistance of the Forest Service, for these 375,000 acres of worthless land the Santa Fe Railroad was permitted to select 380,000 acres of the best of the public lands that yet remained. It was afterwards discovered that through some mistake they had been allowed to take 5,000 acres too much, but so far as I have been able to discover this little insignificant error was never corrected. Thus, more than a million and a quarter acres of our best public lands were given in the name of conservation to the Santa Fe Railroad for practically no consideration whatever. Is it any wonder that the officials of the Santa Fe Railroad were great conservationists?

Although the Commissioner of Public Lands was constantly protesting that the public was being robbed by these transactions, and that the Department of the Interior had no legal right to permit such agreements to be consummated, the conservationists were not to be deterred. They did not, however, restrict their favors entirely to the railroads. They were exceedingly generous in these gifts of the public lands to private corporations.

A company owned 48,000 acres in California. The city of Santa Barbara, Cal., said it would be a splendid thing to have this strip included in a forest reserve, in order to protect their water supply. The Commissioner of Public Lands said that if the city would buy this strip he would be glad to recommend that it be included in the forest reserve, and stated, as shown by the records in the case, that such land was worth only about 40 cents an acre, and that for the Government to include it in a forest reserve and give lieu-land scrip therefor would be a great injustice to the Government. But those who were interested in the transaction, ably assisted by the Forest Service, objected, and the transaction, in spite of the protests of the Commissioner of Public Lands, was consummated, and this private corporation was permitted to give this 48,000 acres of 40-cent land to the United States and to select therefor 48,000 acres of the best nontimbered public land in all the public domain. And that, of course, was done in the name of the people and "conservation."

But the Forest Service and the railroads, having so successfully "conserved" the resources of the Southwest, having permitted the Santa Fe Railroad to trade the great rattlesnake playground of the Nation for the best public lands beneath the flag, were anxious, like Alexander of old, for more land to conquer and more forests to "conserve." These friends of the people discovered that there were other railroads that had worthless lands and that there were still parts of the public domain that contained forest lands of great value. The clamor of "Save the forests for the people" was growing louder. More railroads were becoming interested. More railroad money was being put into the propaganda. The great captains of the Northwest were encouraged by the success of the great captains of the Southwest. The railroads and the Forest Service turned their patriotic eyes toward the great Pacific Northwest. Here millions of acres of virgin forest, some of the most valuable of all this earth, still remained the property of the Nation. Mingled with this public land were many acres of fine timberland belonging to the Northern Pacific Railway, that it had received under the land grant from Congress. But here, also, the Northern Pacific owned some barren, rocky mountain tops, utterly worthless except for scenery. Of course, these facts did not escape the attention of the "conservationists." The railroad men of the Northwest, as well as the railroad men of the Southwest, were active and influential in the "conservation" movement. They contributed the sinews of war that added strength to the chorus that "the forests should be preserved." They demanded that the Government should create forest reserves in the Northwest where there was timber, as they had created them in the Southwest where there was none. These railroad men, joined by Weyerhaeuser and other great "conservationists," were so patriotic that they were not only ready and willing to raise their voices but the cash to save the forests for the people.

The Mount Rainier National Park was created, and for this act, aiding and abetting the "conservationists," Congress is directly responsible. Then by Executive order the Pacific Forest Reserve was created. In these two creations, mostly in the Pacific Forest Reserve, were included 450,000 acres of barren and practically worthless land belonging to the Northern Pacific Railway. This land was largely the crests of high mountain ranges above timber line, much of it covered by glaciers and eternal snows, none of it of much value. Then the old, familiar transaction took place. For these worthless acres, with the consent and the assistance of the Forest Service, the Northern Pacific was permitted to select 450,000 acres of the best timbered land in America, worth to-day at the least calculation $10,000,000. According to the estimate of the Bureau of Corporations, it would be worth $50,000,000. This vast tract belonging to the people of the United States was taken from them and, in the name of conservation, given to the Northern Pacific Railway. Having received this great gift for nothing, the Northern Pacific Railway in turn sold most of it to the Weyerhaeuser syndicate.

Mr. SHARP. Is that the fine scenery which the Northern Pacific Railway is now advertising along its route?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Some of it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will wait just a minute.

Mr. MURDOCK. Just on this point.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will wait until I get through this, I will. I have no desire to cut the gentleman off.

The national forests in the Northwest had been established; the people's rights had been made secure; the unselfish patriotism of Weyerhaeuser and the railroads vindicated, and the great timber monopoly of the Northwest placed upon a secure and enduring foundation.

By the time these transactions which I have enumerated were completed, and many others of a similar character, Congress began to realize that the railroads and not the people were the real beneficiaries of this policy of creating national forests. A bill was introduced and passed through the House repealing this lieu-land law, but the friends of "conservation" blocked its prompt passage in the Senate. There was a reason. The Northern Pacific still owned some worthless land and some fine forests still stood on the public domain. According to the best information I can obtain, while this bill was pending in the Senate, by Executive order 240,000 acres of barren and comparatively worthless land belonging to the Northern Pacific Railway in the State of Montana was included in a forest reserve. Scrip for it was hurriedly issued. The creation of further forest reserves in the Pacific Northwest was considerately suspended until the railroads were given time to use this scrip. Thus, again, the Northern Pacific received as a gift 240,000 acres of the best timbered land in the Northwest, worth to-day at least $5,000,000. This done, other reserves were hurriedly created, and the bill was passed, became law, and this most astounding and most reprehensible practice in the history of this Nation of giving the railways the best public lands for nothing was ended. Congress also prohibited the further creation of national forests by Executive order in the Pacific Coast States.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, before the gentleman goes into that——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield to the gentleman in a minute.

I have not given all the transactions where the public lands were given to railroads and to other private interests practically for nothing. The exact facts are hard to obtain, but I hope I have found at least some of the worst and most flagrant cases, and certainly I have found all that is necessary to show the methods followed. These transactions that I have related demonstrate more strikingly than any other chapter in the history of this Nation the danger and the evil of Congress giving the power to departments and bureaus. This mistake on the part of Congress is directly responsible for the people of this Nation being robbed of many millions of acres of the public domain solely for the benefit of the railroad and other private interests. No sane man will for a moment contend that any one of these transactions, whereby the people were robbed of their national inheritance, would ever have been consummated if it had required legislative action. Not one of these transactions could for a moment have stood the publicity of discussion. In future years these transactions, giving millions of acres of the best of the public domain to the railroads in exchange for barren and worthless lands, transactions that were urged and engineered by the great railroads without objection from the Forest Service, will be recognized as the greatest crime against the American people perpetrated in this generation.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, the gentleman speaks of exchange of lands, or rocks, rather, upon the slopes of Mount Rainier for timbered sections of land elsewhere for the benefit of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and attempts to put that at the door of Mr. Pinchot and the Forest Service. Does the gentleman realize that that exchange was made possible by a law passed by Congress on March 2, 1899?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Did I not say so?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think the gentleman did. As a matter of fact, Congress gave that permission by law, a law passed on that date, and I have no doubt in my mind that the law itself originated in the gentleman's country and was drawn and prepared by a gentleman from the gentleman's own State.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Name him.

Mr. MURDOCK. I can not name him; but I do know that this law was passed on March 2, 1899, and that it permitted the exchange of these valueless mountain lands in the State for scrip which could be used for good Government lands. Why does not the gentleman state that fact? Why does the gentleman try to put it at the door of the Forest Service?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech. I merely yielded for a question from the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why does not the gentleman put this at the door of Congress instead of putting it at the door of the Forest Service?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I will not consent to be interrupted again until I have finished. I already stated to the gentleman that that was true. I stated that Congress was to blame for the laws that had been passed, and only a moment ago I attempted to point out to the gentleman that the foundation of the evil was with Congress for giving such great power to the Forest Service. But the foresters were supposed to be experts, and they were supposed to be working in the interest of the people, and yet every one of those transactions was not only favored but urged by the Forest Service.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the gentleman will remember that that was a matter of scrip, which the Northern Pacific Railroad could plaster all over the country if it wanted to, and it was not the fault of the Forest Service, but the fault of Congress. And I think the gentleman so concedes and so confesses, does he not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I do not; and I hope the gentleman will not interject a concession or admission into a speech of mine. I shall not yield to the gentleman if he attempts to do that any more.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not true that when Congress passed the lieu-land law the department held for a considerable time that it did not apply to railroad lands? And is it not true that the officials of the General Land Office constantly held that until they were overturned by Mr. Hitchcock, who said that the law did apply to the railroad lands?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is true; and it is shown that they contended so repeatedly. The Commissioner of the General Land Office contended all the time that this was illegal, notably in that particular case where the 48,000 acres belonged to the company near Santa Barbara, in California. In that case the Commissioner of the Land Office said that such exchange was against the law; that it would be cheating the Government to trade good lands for lands of no value. But notwithstanding that fact the Forest Service kept insisting on it until this trade was made.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman again yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not also true that when the General Land Office recommended the creation of the forest reserve in California it consisted, when created, of only exchanged lands in checkerboard form and did not include railroad lands until they were included by the order of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes. That is what I managed to cull out of the voluminous reports.

Mr. MONDELL. It was two years after the checkerboard-form sections were included that the railroad lands were finally added?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman give us the name of the man who was then President? During the course of the gentleman's remarks he constantly referred to "the President." At the suggestion of several gentlemen around me, I ask the gentleman his name.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will look at the records he will probably find the name.

Mr. KEATING. His name was Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, along that line——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I shall not yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will not the gentleman do me the courtesy of yielding for a moment?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If it is for a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; it is for a mere suggestion, which I think will be agreeable to the gentleman. That is in reference to public officials. I think the gentleman ought to say that the President at that time was Theodore Roosevelt and give the name of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who was Binger Hermann.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have no objection, but I have supposed that most of the gentlemen here knew who was President at a certain specific time; if the gentleman thinks not, I will insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Gentlemen will occupy all my time, and I will not be able to finish.

Mr. MURDOCK. I realize that we are not going to get in to-day. I thought we would.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman ought not, for that reason, to take all my time.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman knows——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield for a question, and then I am not going to yield any more until I indicate that I am ready to yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. I thank the gentleman for yielding this once. Does the gentleman realize that Secretary Hitchcock, when this matter of the San Francisco mountain reserve came to his notice, did not enter into a contract, and that thereafter Congress validated his transactions, calling them contracts, when, as a matter of fact, they were not? And, in view of that fact, does not the gentleman put this matter at the door of Congress rather than at the door of the Forestry Bureau?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I know this much: That the Secretary of the Interior on two occasions refused to approve these exchanges, and I know that after that the Forest Service urged it, and I know that Mr. Loeb wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, wanting to know what he was doing about it. That is what the record shows.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the record also show that Congress validated these exchanges?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. MONDELL. Just one question right there. Is it not also of record——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield for one question.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not also of record that while the bill was pending before the Senate the Secretary of the Interior insisted, not once only but several times, that his agreement or contract or whatever you call it, was recognized?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am going to ask you gentlemen, now, not to interrupt me until I get through. I have been talking about things that are of the past. I want to talk about the present now.

I want to call your attention to this map of the State of Washington, to give you some idea of how we are conserved in the West. This brown portion of the map represents the forest reserves. Here is Mount Rainier Park. The red-colored portion represents the Indian reservation. In other words, speaking in round numbers, there are 25,000 square miles in the State of Washington withdrawn from settlement, withdrawn from taxation, blocking the development of that State.

ADMINISTRATION OF FOREST RESERVES.

But giving them for worthless lands the best public lands the Nation possessed was not the only way the Forest Service has benefited the railroads. Their present methods are illustrated by what they have done in the State of Washington. Their policy is the same everywhere. In the State of Washington they have practically withdrawn from the market more than one-fourth of all the timberlands in the State. This has resulted, as every intelligent man knew it must result, in a tremendous increase in the holdings of the railroads and the Weyerhaeuser syndicate. The Forest Service is, as it always has been, working in perfect accord and in the interests of the great private timber ownership to produce a monopoly of the timber supply and to increase the price of forest products. They are following the very effective method of increasing the price by limiting the supply, a method that of recent years has gotten some estimable men not representing the Government into the penitentiary.

Here are some figures taken from the last annual report of the Forester. He estimates that 5,700,000,000 feet of timber can annually be cut from the national forest reserves without decreasing their value. In other words, that is what he estimates to be the crop that ripens each year for the harvesting, and if not cut, like any other crop, is forever lost. The amount of this crop harvested for the benefit of the people, for those who are to-day protesting against the high price of timber products, is only 7 per cent of the whole. In other words, 7 per cent of the people's crop of timber is used and 93 per cent rots in the forest. And this is called "conservation." And also remember that the million dollars' worth that the people were permitted to use cost them more than $2,000,000. The Forest Service not only fails to cut but 7 per cent of their own crop, but in the State of Washington they have included in the reserves 666,000 acres of timberland that belongs to the State and so hedged it about that the State can not cut any portion of it, taking this vast amount absolutely from the market; and on all these thousands and hundreds of thousands and millions of acres the timber rots and decays for the benefit of the people and to the glory of "conservation."

If the Government should acquire one-fourth of all the wheat growing in the country, and then when it had ripened to the harvest, while the people were clamoring for bread, permit only 7 per cent of it to be harvested, while the 93 per cent rotted in the field, it would be pursuing exactly the policy that the Forest Service is doing to-day in regard to the great timber crops of the Nation. The Forest Service claims that they can not cut more than what they are cutting from the national forests and sell it for a reasonable price. This is probably true, for they demand the same price that is demanded by the great timber barons of the West. But certainly the purpose of the Forest Service is not to get a high price for timber, but to permit the public, the American people, to use what otherwise will be wasted. But this is not and never has been the result of conservation as practiced in relation to the national forests. Their idea of conservation as practiced is not to use the timber products of the United States, but to waste it and compel the people of the United States to pay for 7 per cent of that crop what they should pay for the entire 100 per cent. Much of the timber that the Forest Service does sell is sold upon long-term contracts, giving the purchaser many years in which to remove the timber. This, again, leads to monopoly, and to keeping it off the market. It leads to speculation, especially as the purchaser can hold the timber so purchased through all of these years without the payment of taxes, a privilege that, so far as I know, is not extended to any other class of property. But all these transactions, of course, tremendously increase the value of the timber that is privately owned, and consequently strengthens the monopoly that owns the timber lands on the Pacific coast. It is a conservative estimate to say that the system of national forests as it has been practiced since its establishment has given to the railroads and to the Weyerhaeuser syndicate, in the State of Washington alone, not less than $50,000,000, and that the same system has given to the railroads and the Weyerhaeuser syndicate in the Pacific Coast States of Washington, California, Oregon, and Idaho not less than the vast and incomprehensible sum of $200,000,000. This vast sum that belonged to the people has been given to these great private interests in the name of "conservation." Not only have these vast sums been given to these private interests, but the Forest Service, by its policy of taking one-fourth of all the timbered lands of the Pacific coast, or one-eighth of the lands in the United States off the market, is constantly increasing the price of every foot of timber that is sold in the United States.

According to the annual report of the Forest Service, they give to the American people $1,000,000 worth of forest products from the great national reserves each year and permit $15,000,000 worth to rot in the woods. Is it any wonder since the establishment of the forest reserves in the Pacific Northwest that the price of timber products has constantly increased?

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield to the gentleman briefly for a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman realizes that 75 per cent of the Government timber is inaccessible?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not realize anything of the kind. I think the statement of the gentleman is perfectly absurd. Why do not they sell the timber that is accessible; why do they keep it off the market? They do it because they require the prices fixed by the Weyerhaeuser syndicate. They practically state that it is as much benefit to them to let the timber rot as it is to put it on the market, because they can get as much for a part of it as they would for the whole, owing to the increase in price.

THE SOURCE OF "CONSERVATION."

It is interesting to trace the history of the conservation movement in this country. It received its first impetus from what is known as the American Forestry Association. A roll call of the officers, directors, and sustainers of that organization is like calling the sinister roll of the great vested "interests" of the Nation. Railroad presidents, railroad attorneys, railroad directors, timber barons, wood-pulp and paper kings, and millionaire manufacturers are especially prominent. Almost every railroad in the United States has been prominently represented in this movement and has largely directed and financed it. Here are some of the men that have been active in the movement: Frederick Weyerhaeuser, the timber king of the world; James J. Hill; Austin Corwin; W. W. Finley, railroad presidents; Edward D. Adams, railroad president and great water-power magnate; Gen. Thomas H. Hubbard; Cyrus H. McCormick; Henry Phipps; George W. Vanderbilt; Hugh J. Chisholm, wood-pulp king and railroad president; and many other multimillionaires, representing every corporate interest in the United States that has since directly profited by this policy, have been active in this propaganda. They not only gave their influence and their voice, but they gave their cash, to advance this conservation idea in the name of the people.

For several years I could not understand the interest or the motive of these men in this conservation movement. I saw "as through a glass, darkly." But since I have come face to face with the facts I see clearly, as I trace the transfer of millions of acres of the public domain from the people to the interests represented in this great "conservation" movement. If you look upon the map of the United States to-day and trace the vast regions that belonged to the Government, to the people, but a few years ago, and which, under the conservation movement, have been turned over to these interests, the splendid patriotism of these disinterested gentlemen stands forth in all its sublime unselfishness. The railroad interests and those interested in the forest products of this country have furnished the brains and the money, except what money has been taken from the United States Treasury by the Forest Service, that have made conservation what it is in the Pacific Northwest to-day, and these gentlemen have reaped their reward. Associated with these men were the dreamers and the impractical and the unintelligent educated theorists. And many others, without giving it much attention, joined the movement, believing that it was right and in the interests of the people. Added to these were many political demagogues, who used it to personal advantage. But all the other classes were the dupes and tools of the strong men that represented the great interests that have so tremendously profited through its workings. This strong class of men knew what they were in the movement for. I shall not denounce them. They were men of brains, of influence, of tremendous resource, of much wealth, and of great audacity. An empire was at stake. They were inspired by a dream as bold as that which seized the brain of Balboa, when for the first time he stood upon the backbone of the Western World and gazed for the first time upon the boundless Pacific. As daring as that which filled the matchless mind of the imperial Cæsar as he led his invincible legions across the Alps toward Gaul. These men played the game well, and they won, and the prize is a princely domain, greater in resources, greater in potential wealth, than half the kingdoms of the earth.

COST OF ADMINISTRATION.

It is estimated by the Forest Service that the standing timber in the national forest reserves is worth $1,045,000,000. Mr. Pinchot estimates it at more than $2,000,000,000. But I will use the more conservative figures. What are we receiving from this mighty national resource? What are the people receiving from this more than princely heritage? We are receiving the pitiful sum of $1,000,000 a year—less than one-tenth of 1 per cent. Is that a reasonable return on this great wealth? And let it not be forgotten that we pay two dollars for every one we receive; or, in other words, this vast property, instead of being self-sustaining under the present and past policy of the Forest Service, is losing the American people a million dollars each year, to say nothing of waste and decay. Instead of receiving a million dollars a year gross returns from the sale of timber we should receive at least sixty-five million. This would only be 40 cents per acre. The Forest service could sell annually $30,000,000 worth of timber products from the national reserves in the Pacific Coast States alone, without in any way depleting the supply or reducing the value. It is the proud boast of the Forest Service that some time it will be self-supporting. We heard this promise for many years, but it makes practically no progress in that direction. Under the present national-forest system how much shall it profit the people if it takes a billion dollars' worth of property and a million dollars in cash each year to feed the parasites that control it? Where do the people's interests come in? What would be thought of a guardian or an administrator that would take a billion dollars' worth of standing timber and could not manage it in these times of high prices so that it would be self-sustaining lacking a million dollars each year? Not only are these vast forests withdrawn from public use while the people are taxed a million dollars each year to pay the so-called foresters to care for them, although what these gentlemen do no man yet has ever been able to discover, but these vast tracts that are unused by the Government are also withdrawn from State taxation. By this action the States of the West are robbed of that equality guaranteed to them under the Constitution. This is a monstrous injustice for which there is no justification except only that the Government has the power to do it. In the beginning the Western States were promised—and we believed that promise—that the States in which these national forests were located, in lieu of taxes, would receive a sum from the sale of the timber that would approximately equal that loss. That promise is still being repeated, as is the old, old promise that some day the Forest Service will be self-supporting. We no longer have faith in any such promise; in fact, we now know that it never will be kept.

Mr. Gifford Pinchot is probably the leading exponent in America of this national forest policy. He is my friend, and a most pleasing personality. In a recent issue of Pearson's Magazine he discusses this identical proposition. In one portion of the article he did what a conservationist seldom does and what they should never do. It was a fatal mistake. He uses figures instead of adjectives. These figures given by him is the most scathing denunciation of the Forest Service ever uttered. If they did not come from highest authority I would hesitate to use them. They demonstrate not only the utter worthlessness of the Forest Service but they further demonstrate that through the incompetency and negligence of this service millions of dollars' worth of timber on the public domain in the State of Washington each year have been wasted. Let me read to you:

The facts are that in the eight years, 1905 to 1912, inclusive, during which the Forest Service has had charge of the national forests, 415,512,900 feet of timber has been sold from the national forests of the State of Washington. The average cut during that period was not seven but seventeen and a half million feet annually. For the last three years the cut has averaged a little over 30,000,000 feet, and during the last year it reached 37,000,000 feet. (Pearson's Magazine, May, 1913, p. 623.)

No enemy could have so convicted the Forest Service of criminal waste and stupidity as do these figures here given. What do these figures mean? They mean that in the most densely forested regions of the world, where 150,000 feet are frequently cut from a single acre, the Forest Service annually is cutting from each acre less than a foot and a half. They mean that in that boasted year of 1912, when the service was forced to sell some fire-killed timber, they actually cut from the forest reserves in the State of Washington at the rate of one plank for each acre, 3 feet 1 inch long, 12 inches wide, and 1 inch thick. They mean that on an empire containing 23,000 square miles—a region greater than Rhode Island, greater than Delaware, greater than Connecticut, greater than New Jersey, greater than Massachusetts, greater than all these States combined—the Forest Service in the name of conservation is annually cutting 350 acres of timber. They mean that a single mill in the State of Washington will cut the entire output from the national forest reserves in that State running less than three months each year. In the State of Washington the forests fully reproduce themselves in from 30 to 50 years. For the purpose of wood pulp used for making paper they fully reproduce themselves in 16 to 20 years. How long at the present rate of cutting that has been practiced by the Forest Service for the last eight years, as pointed out by Mr. Pinchot, will it take to cut over once the national forests in the State of Washington? Only 35,000 years. That is all. Here in these figures proudly furnished by the chief prophet of the policy is demonstrated the supreme essence of "conservation" as it is practiced in all its sublime idiocy.

AMOUNT RECEIVED BY STATES IN LIEU OF TAXES.

Mr. Pinchot answers the complaint made by the States, and especially the State of Washington, that they are not receiving adequate sums in lieu of the taxes that they lose by these national forest reserves, in the following language:

The Western States now receive for their schools and roads, in lieu of taxes, 25 per cent of the gross revenue from the national forests. Up to January 30, 1912, they have thus received $2,606,400, of which $115,205 went to the State of Washington. The present Congress has set aside an additional 10 per cent for building roads, and over $200,000 has already been made available. In some places the proceeds from this 35 per cent of the gross revenue already exceeds what would be produced by taxation under private ownership. In others it still falls short. In the end it will surely exceed it everywhere. (Pearson's Magazine, May, 1913, p. 623.)

Let us analyze these figures and see how they harmonize with his statement that the States are practically reimbursed for taxes thus lost. He says the State of Washington in the eight years has received from 12,000,000 acres of land $115,000, or $14,400 annually, or 1¼ cents per acre—a magnificent return surely on some of the finest timber land in the world, estimated by the Bureau of Corporations that much of it is worth from $100 to $200 per acre. The "conservationists" think that this $14,400 should satisfy the State of Washington. Mr. Pinchot says that in some places it—referring to the payment made by the Forest Service—already exceeds what the taxes would be. He significantly does not name the places. How is it in the State of Washington? I think that the valuation fixed by the Bureau of Corporations at from $100 to $200 per acre is entirely too high. Place it at one-fifth of their lowest figure—$20 per acre. It would certainly sell to-day for more than that. At the rate of taxation imposed in our State upon private timber holdings the State would receive, not the pitiful sum of $14,400 per year, but $7,593,500 annually. Or, in other words, if this timber was permitted to be taxed in the State of Washington as we tax private timber, we would get as much money for it every year as the Forest Service would pay us in 528 years. This timber is fully worth that much to the State of Washington. Can any human being see why it is not worth equally as much to the Nation? Will any man dispute that from the forest reserves of the State of Washington alone this Nation is annually losing more than $7,500,000? The magnificent forests of the State of Washington, as valuable as any beneath the sun, the way they are now administered are worth just 3.8 cents per acre. The State of Washington, according to the figures given by Mr. Pinchot himself, has already lost in the past eight years more than $60,000,000. And this vast sum has been absolutely wasted, benefiting no one beneath the stars, except that it has added to the wealth of the railroads and the Weyerhaeuser syndicate and other private timber owners, and the few inexperienced youths, called in forest language "silviculturists," whatever that may mean, have received a salary from the Government for their wonderful achievements.

FOREST REPRODUCTION.

There is another practice of the Forest Service that ought to be ended, if their own figures given in the Forester's annual report are correct, and that is the farce of planting trees. The forest reserves as administered to-day are worth to the Government 6 per cent at the rate of 17½ cents per acre. Certainly a magnificent return. It takes, I suppose, the average forest throughout the United States 50 years to mature to a point where as much timber could be cut from it as the original crop furnished. The Forest Service tells us that they have reduced the cost of planting, so that an acre can now be planted for $11.05. But only one acre in two survives; or, in other words, the Forest Service to produce an acre of trees expends $22.10, and if nothing happens to that acre in 50 years it will pay 6 per cent on the valuation of 17½ cents; or, under this magnificent plan of reforestation the Government by an expenditure of $98.40 can get an acre of timber worth 17½ cents in 50 years. And then, if the Forest Service follows its present policy, they will let 16 cents of the 17½ cents rot in the forest. Certainly this is a striking illustration of the great value of conservation and of the great effort that is being made in that holy name to protect the rights of the people.

REMEDY.

What is the remedy? The first thing is to ascertain the facts. No intelligent information can be received to-day about many of the transactions and practices followed in relation to the national forests from the Forest Service.

It is now probably too late to ever take from the railroads the millions of acres that they have been given of the most valuable part of the public domain in exchange for worthless lands in forest reserves. But the truth in regard to these transactions in all of its details should be known and published to the world.

Undoubtedly many millions of acres now included in forest reserves that contain no timber, and never will, should be eliminated.

The forest reserves of Alaska should be abandoned. There was never any reason for their establishment, and their continuance is wholly a useless and indefensible expense. There would be just as much sense in establishing a game preserve around the North Pole as there would be to continue these forest reserves in Alaska.

Some method should be found to market the timber that annually ripens, instead of permitting it to decay in the forest.

These national forests should not only pay the cost of administration, but they should and would, if properly handled, pay to the National Government not less than $65,000,000 annually. These reserves should be taken from the control of theorists and students and given into the control of business men and practical lumbermen.

State control is savagely assailed by every so-called "conservationist," and their criticism has in many respects been justified. The States have not always administered their timber in a way that is above criticism. But the State of Washington has so administered its 2,000,000 acres, notwithstanding that 666,000 are absolutely locked up in the national forests, as to produce a surplus of $12,000,000, while the National Forest Service has so administered its 12,000,000 acres in that State that it has not even paid half the cost of administration. Certainly it does not lie in the mouth of the Forest Service, in view of its own record, to criticize State control.

It is now the imperative duty of Congress to enact such legislation as will cause this great national resource of measureless wealth to be used for the general good, instead of being wasted for the glory of "conservation" and the further enrichment of the great lumber barons of the Nation.

The truth is that while the clamor of the "conservationists" is constantly increasing the price of timber is constantly advancing and the great timber barons are constantly increasing their holdings.

The truth is that $65,000,000 worth of timber, through the stupidity of the Forest Service, annually rots unharvested in the forest, while the price of lumber constantly increases.

The truth is that the Forest Service has, knowingly or unknowingly, always worked in the interest of the Weyerhaeuser Syndicate, the railroads, and other great private timber owners and against the consumer of forest products.

The truth is that the national forest, with more than a billion dollars' worth of timber, a kingdom in extent five times greater than Scotland, more than three times greater than England and Wales, more than one-third larger than the German Empire or the Republic of France, is largely the plaything of a bunch of theorists and inexperienced schoolboys. [Applause.]

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE KONIG.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce to this House the death of my colleague, Hon. GEORGE KONIG, of the third Maryland district, which occurred on Saturday evening last. Mr. KONIG entered upon the activities of this life as an errand boy. He was what we call a "self-made man." He educated himself. His opportunities for acquiring an education while young were so meager that along with his other heavy tasks he undertook and acquired an education while in his twenties. He was energetic and persevering, and through this and through the many friendships which he laid up during life he was able to win the congressional nomination of the Democratic Party, and was elected to the Sixty-second Congress from a district which had long been in the possession of the opposing party. During his membership in this House he followed out the principles and precepts of his party at all times and under all circumstances. He looked upon the platform of his party as a contract entered into with the people and carried out that contract to the letter. He was a loving husband and father, and one of Baltimore's good citizens. At a later date I shall ask the House to set apart a time for pronouncing eulogies upon his character and public services. At this time I present the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 120.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE KONIG, a Representative from the State of Maryland.

Resolved, That a committee of 14 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Under the resolution the Speaker appointed the following committee: Mr. COVINGTON, Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, Mr. LINTHICUM, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. LEWIS of Maryland, Mr. MCDERMOTT, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. SABATH, Mr. BAKER, Mr. HAYES, Mr. BARTHOLDT, Mr. BARTON, Mr. WOODS, and Mr. GARDNER.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the remaining resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 3, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 3, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that the aggregate amount of good in the world exceeds the aggregate amount of evil; that the good is ever increasing while evil is diminishing; that the sum of human happiness, therefore, exceeds the sum of human misery, because Thou dost live and reign in the hearts of men.

Faith is stronger than doubt, hope than despair, love than hate. Incline our hearts to do Thy will, that we may be the instruments in Thy hands for the furtherance of good, that Thy kingdom may indeed come and Thy will be done in all hearts through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF CERTAIN BILLS.

By unanimous consent reference of the bill H. R. 4762, to amend the general pension act of May 11, 1912, as amended by the act of March 4, 1913, was changed from the Committee on Pensions to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The bill H. R. 2944, to provide a system of compensation for injuries resulting in disability or death to employees of common carriers subject to the regulative power of Congress, to civil employees of the United States Government, and for other purposes, introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Heretofore such bills have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to enter into any contest as to the jurisdiction of the bill. I have always been willing to trust the Speaker as to the proper reference of these bills. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is the father of that subject in this House, and has introduced that bill for three or four Congresses, and on every occasion it has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that it ought to go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but all of those bills heretofore have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary. At least that is the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] in the Congress before last introduced, I think, a bill upon this subject which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Judiciary afterwards reported a resolution, as I recall it, creating a commission. That commission reported a bill. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not recall—though I take the word of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] upon this, as I do upon everything else—that the Sabath bill, so-called, which was reintroduced, went to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. However, the subject matter has invariably gone to the Committee on the Judiciary for several years.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, a subcommittee had charge of the Sabath bill during the last Congress and considered it thoroughly. There were hearings upon it, and I think that subcommittee prepared a report. For some reason that report was not made to the House, probably out of courtesy to the preceding report of the Committee on the Judiciary, which came in ahead of it. It is probable that for that reason the Sabath bill was not reported by our committee. It was, however, investigated and a subcommittee of our committee gave it a thorough study.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, all bills of this character which have ever been considered by the House have come from the Judiciary Committee. At the last session of Congress that committee reported a workmen's compensation act, and prior to that the committee had reported a compensation act for Government employees, and prior to that they had reported and it was enacted into a statute a partial compensation act for Government employees. The whole subject matter has been before the Committee on the Judiciary for five or six years, and not less than three bills have been reported, one of which is on the statute books.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the liability bill, so called, went through the Committee on the Judiciary. It is undoubtedly true that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which is the greatest committee in the House, in my opinion, has a scope of jurisdiction under the commerce clause of the Constitution that is almost coextensive with the powers of government, but that committee has not always claimed the jurisdiction of bills, because it has always had plenty to do with important legislation and sometimes has been compelled to relegate some of these matters to a minor committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say that the subject of workingmen's compensation belongs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. As the Speaker well knows, there is an inevitable overlapping of the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The first time in a matter of great legislation there happened to be a change from the ordinary course of reference, which the Chair and many of the older Members of the House will recall, was during Mr. Hepburn's incumbency of the chairmanship of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The interstate shipment of liquor bills, which primarily dealt with legislation which was dependent for its validity upon the commerce clause of the Constitution, were by a general consent of this House referred by Mr. Speaker Cannon to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is now well known that questions other than those of a legal character were involved, and the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce acquiesced in the reference. But the subject of employers' liability and workingmen's compensation is one that is so linked with railroad regulation that it should emanate from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The authority of Congress to deal with it exists alone by reason of the commerce clause of the Constituence. But the subject of employers' liability and workingmen's to rates and as to the safety of their operation, is reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and while it is true that the Committee on the Judiciary was permitted late in the last session to report the bill prepared by the joint commission on workingmen's compensation I urge that the Speaker preserve the balance and jurisdiction of the committees of this House by sustaining the original reference of the bill of Mr. SABATH to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he will hold this matter in abeyance until he can look into it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has come in, and I think he would like to make a statement to the Chair on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, the same bill has been referred by a former Speaker to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee has investigated my bill and has held some hearings and has devoted a good deal of time to the subject matter, and if it was proper in the last session to refer the bill to that committee I believe it is proper now. I believe and my opinion is that it properly belongs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hold this matter until he can investigate the whole subject. There is no subject that Congress has anything to do with which is in practice in as bad a mix up as the jurisdiction of committees over bills. In the first place, not infrequently there is a bill you can refer to either one of two committees with propriety and in fewer cases to any one of three committees.

Now, if there is any sort of bill on earth that looks like it ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means it is an oleomargarine bill, because the only excuse Congress ever had for legislating on that subject was the pretext of raising revenue, and yet it was firmly settled by the practice of the House that such a bill should go to the Committee on Agriculture, and no Speaker would like very well to upset that line of reference. It all came about because the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture at the time was a man of great force and character and a fighter, and he determined that the Committee on Agriculture should have something to do. That man was the late Col. William H. Hatch, of Missouri.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will allow me an observation in regard to the oleomargarine bill being referred to the Committee on Agriculture. That was in the Congress where Mr. Carlisle was Speaker, and the bill was introduced, was sent to the Committee on Ways and Means; but that committee was hostile to the legislation, and by vote of the House, on motion of Mr. Hatch, of Missouri, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the House referred it to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The way it got before the Committee on Agriculture was because of the force of character and the fighting qualities of Mr. Hatch, of Missouri.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, if the same principle would be applied to this bill as is applied to the oleomargarine bill I think this bill does belong to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce because it deals with that subject and with nothing else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will investigate the whole subject and see if we can not get that jurisdiction straightened out.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation:

JUNE 3, 1913.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Accounts, and respectfully request the acceptance of the same, to take effect immediately.

Respectfully, WM. SCHLEY HOWARD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. GEORGE KONIG, late a Representative from the State of Maryland.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. KONIG at Baltimore, Md.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased that the Senate do adjourn.

And in compliance with the foregoing resolutions the Vice President had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. CHILTON, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama, Mr. JONES, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. JACKSON as the Committee on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2272. An act providing for an increase in the number of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy after June 30, 1913.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 2.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Joint Committee on Printing be, and hereby is, authorized to employ a stenographer, compensation at the rate of $75 per month, to be paid one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided for.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the election of the committees which I send to the Clerk's desk. Mr. Speaker, before the Clerk reads the list of committees I wish to say that the Democrats on this list of committees are proposed to the House by the Democratic caucus. I make the nominations for the Republican members of the committees at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the leader of the Republican Party, and of the Progressive members on these committees at the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], the leader of the Progressive Party.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman submit to an inquiry?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What was done about the Committee on Territories?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, the gentleman's list is in this list here. I overlooked the fact, and if he desires to submit a request for an additional place I will have no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the last House the Committee on Territories consisted, as I believe, of 15 or 16 members, and the Republicans had, I think, six members on the committee. There was an error in the printing of the committee list, both in the ordinary list and in the Directory, whereby the Republicans were given seven places, some of them being vacancies; but when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and myself were together in reference to the number of places upon committees there were marked down for the Republicans on that committee six, and for the Progressives one, leaving, as I supposed, for the Democrats the ordinary number. It turns out that, while those places were filled, the six places filled by me would involve an extra place, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that for this Congress the number of members on the Committee on Territories may be increased by one, without changing the general rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that for this Congress the number of members on the Committee on Territories shall be increased by one, without changing the general rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will announce the committees.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, one moment. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yield for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman that in making his statement about the manner of the selection of committees he omitted to state a fact which I think should go into the RECORD, namely, that the Progressives selected their committees in open caucus—an entirely new method—and we found it practicable and satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. I suppose after they had been previously selected by a secret conference, before the open caucus was held. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. It was an open caucus, and changes could have been made if desired.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the list.

During the reading of the foregoing the following occurred:

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. At this time would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that the reading of the list of committees be dispensed with? I suppose that every Member of the House knows the committee he is assigned to, and the reading, therefore, would be merely formal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of this list of committees.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the rules provide for a reform—the election of committees of the House by the House itself. Now, we have absolutely departed from the spirit of the rule already. Why not at least comply with the terms of the rule by having committees elected by the House? I think that in compliance with the form of the rule we at least ought to have the names read as agreed upon by the different parties in advance.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] withdraws his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Upon the reading of the list of names under our new system of electing committees, it is in order for a Member to move to strike out a name and substitute another name, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Of course it is. That is the question that the Chair puts when this list is read. After the Clerk has read the list the Chair asks if there are any other names to be placed in nomination. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to read the Ways and Means Committee members. There is only one name changed there, that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I notice that a moment ago I did not hear the resignation of any Democratic member of that committee submitted to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was already acted upon yesterday.

Mr. MANN. I did not notice it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the list.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other nominations for any place on any committee?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. As it will not produce any trouble to have a ruling, if the Speaker will make one, I will ask, would it be in order now for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in making his motion, to move the previous question on it, and thereby cut out further nominations, or is this a nomination on which no one can move the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would hold——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will allow me a moment, I think under the rules it would have been entirely in order for myself or any other Member of the House to have offered a resolution—"Resolved, That the following committees of the House be elected"—and at the end of the reading of the names proposed for membership of the committees it would have been in order for me to move the previous question on the resolution—but——

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman did move the election of the committees.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did.

Mr. MANN. A moment ago the Speaker stated, in answer to a parliamentary inquiry, that any one would have the right to offer further nominations. I do not know what the Speaker's view about it is, but my own inclination is to think that the gentleman from Alabama has the right, after he makes his motion and it is submitted to the House, to move the previous question. But under the statement made by the Speaker, if there are more nominations, of course the man who nominates can not move the previous question on his nomination.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois. I do not think there is any question that I would have the right to move the previous question on this motion, as on every other motion in the House, and then a majority of the House would have the right to adopt the previous question or not, as they saw fit. And that is necessarily so, Mr. Speaker, because a majority of the House must exercise the right to control the business before the House. But I have not moved the previous question.

Mr. MANN. No; I understand. I submitted the parliamentary inquiry, because there was no controversy at this time, to see whether the Speaker was prepared to make a ruling; because the matter might come up at some time when it would be a partisan proposition, or so considered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is nothing but proper that the majority should have a right to control the time, but they ought to be reasonable and just and fair about it. But I think the majority must control.

Mr. MANN. Of course, if under the rules these are mere nominations, and anyone who obtains the floor has a right to submit other nominations, it would be very easy for a small minority of the House to keep the House in session for weeks listening to nominations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. Of course there could be a scheme made up between 435 Members, by transfers each day, which it would take weeks to read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the gentleman is right about that, Mr. Speaker, and I think that it would be necessary under some circumstances, possibly to prevent a filibuster, to move the previous question on the election of the committees. But that condition does not exist to-day.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I understand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So there is no occasion for doing it.

Mr. MANN. I submitted my parliamentary inquiry because of a statement made by the Speaker a moment ago, to see whether he had definite views on the subject as to whether these were mere nominations or whether this was a motion upon which the previous question might be moved.

The SPEAKER. What else can there be except nominations?

Mr. MANN. My recollection of parliamentary law is that a man can not make a nomination where nominations are required and then move the previous question. But he can move the previous question on a motion.

The SPEAKER. The House is just now sitting as a sort of convention, and the practice in conventions is that whenever anybody gets tired of nominations being made, he moves that the nominations be closed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, here are over 400 nominations, and each one of them is a separate nomination. Now, would it not be possible, after the previous question, to demand a division of the nominations and a separate vote?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will allow me a moment, I think the practice of the House is very well settled that there are two ways in which you can elect the officers of this House, and now that the committees are elected by the House they become officers of the House. One way is to nominate and elect an officer as we do the Speaker. Every time that a new Congress assembles we nominate a Speaker, and elect him after the nominations are made.

On the other hand, in every Congress that I have served I think the other officers of the House have been elected by resolution, and a substitute has been offered for it, showing that the House exercises two ways of electing these officers; one being the ordinary course of nominating them and electing them like you would in a convention or a public assembly, and the other by resolution as we nominate or elect the Clerk, the Doorkeeper, and the Sergeant at Arms. The gentleman from Illinois offered a substitute to that resolution. So I think it is very clear that you can offer it either way.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman hold that it would not be in order to ask for a division?

Mr. MANN. We had a division on the resolution offered by the Democratic side of the House for the election of officers of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have merely nominated them, and in the way I have made the motion I think the gentleman could ask for a division, but I think it would be strictly within the rules and practice of the House for me to have written above the list "Resolved, That the following Members be elected members of the committees."

The SPEAKER. That is practically what the gentleman did do.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not ask the Speaker to rule upon this question if he has not fully made up his mind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take time to investigate it. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the list of Members who have been nominated for the committees be elected.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

ASSIGNMENT OF ROOMS TO THE COMMITTEE ON ROADS.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following assignment of rooms in the House Office Building be, and the same is hereby, made:

To the Committee on Roads, rooms 153 and 154 in the House Office Building.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MANN and Mr. FITZGERALD reserved the right to object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not press that at this time. The House Office Commission, which has jurisdiction of this building, has determined that it will exercise its powers in connection with the assignment of rooms in that building. It is very important, because we are about to add some rooms in the building. If the gentleman does not withdraw the resolution at this time I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. PALMER. If the gentleman from New York objects, that will be the end of the present request; but I shall move the adoption of the resolution, because the House has uniformly exercised the power of assigning rooms for committees. It has been done by resolution, and under the precedents that is the proper way to do it. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York what has probably escaped his attention, that when the original resolution was passed by the House in reference to the assignment of rooms in the House Office Building, these two rooms now numbered 153 and 154 were expressly reserved for the use of committees to be hereafter created or for special committees. Members are occupying the rooms now, however, because there were no committees then in existence which required this space. Room 154 is occupied by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], who becomes the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and therefore moves out. The other room is temporarily occupied, in spite of the resolution passed by the House, by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, who will, of course, get a room elsewhere.

In offering this resolution all that is being done is to ask that these two rooms be assigned which were reserved under the resolution prepared by the House Office Commission for the express purpose of having them assigned to a committee at a later date.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. What committee has jurisdiction of this matter under the rules?

Mr. PALMER. There is no committee of the House that has jurisdiction under the rules.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does any committee assume jurisdiction?

Mr. PALMER. No committee assumes jurisdiction so far as I know.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have understood that it did.

Mr. PALMER. Now I want to answer the intimation which appears in the question——

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no intimation; but I understood that a certain committee did assume it.

Mr. PALMER. That is a mistake. I would be glad to tell the House how the matter originated and why I introduced this resolution. Ever since the building of the House Office Building, and the creation of the House Office Commission, members of committees and chairmen of committees desiring to have changes made in their committee assignments have been in the habit of going to a member of that commission to have a resolution introduced in the House. Ever since the construction of the House Office Building they have gone to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman pardon me for an interruption there, because he is in error?

Mr. PALMER. I take this——

Mr. MANN. Very well, if the gentleman does not desire to be corrected.

Mr. PALMER. Oh, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the House Office Building Commission never had anything to do with it, but gentlemen did not go to the House Office Building Commission.

Mr. PALMER. They went to the gentleman from Illinois, and I thought it was for that reason.

Mr. MANN. I had been the chairman of the committee distributing rooms in the House Office Building, but was not then a member of the commission.

Mr. PALMER. Be that as it may, the chairmen of committees had gone to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] with a request that he work out this problem about making changes in committee rooms, and at the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress the chairmen of committees who desired to have changes in their rooms again went to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and asked him to introduce resolutions into the House to work out these changes. The gentleman from Illinois very courteously replied to them that inasmuch as the Democrats had come into power in the House he thought the matter ought to be taken up on the Democratic side, and he referred them to the logical Member for that purpose, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. These gentlemen then pursued Mr. UNDERWOOD with requests that he would introduce resolutions providing for the changes for committee space. Mr. UNDERWOOD was at the time very busily engaged in other work which was of more importance, and he asked me if I would take up the work of trying to satisfy these various committee chairmen and introduce a resolution in the House. He had no jurisdiction over the matter; no committee had jurisdiction over the matter; and any individual could offer the resolution. I went to work upon it and spent two or three days in an effort to get all parties satisfied, and at Mr. UNDERWOOD's request introduced a resolution into the House making changes at the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress. Now, just because I did that, and for no other reason, gentlemen throughout the House have been coming to me much as they came to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] before the Sixty-second Congress came into being. It is only to accommodate them, and because somebody has to look after this thing, that I agreed to introduce the resolution to-day to give these rooms to the Committee on Roads. A Committee on Roads has been created, and it is entitled to committee-room space, and these rooms are available for the purpose. I can not see why anybody should have any objection to allowing the committee to have those rooms.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows that a number of us who were chairmen of committees and who had committee rooms now cease to be chairmen. I am one of those. We have to have rooms somewhere. I do not want to leave the Office Building, with all of my luggage there, and pack it off to the Senate annex. Of course, if the gentleman takes the rooms there now and gives them to committees, he is going to put men out of the Office Building who have been there ever since the building was constructed.

Mr. PALMER. Certainly this committee is entitled to space.

Mr. SIMS. And I thought individuals were entitled to space also.

Mr. PALMER. They are. Under the statute they leave their committee rooms, but in every case some individual who before did not have a committee room becomes the chairman of a committee.

Mr. SIMS. I understand that.

Mr. PALMER. And the chairmen of committees will find themselves in possession of the offices now occupied by gentlemen who have been promoted to committee chairmanships.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman will remember they are all occupied now, and the gentleman's statement on the floor shows that he is going to take two of them out of rooms now occupied, and therefore two gentlemen who have offices there will have to get out of the building.

Mr. PALMER. But they are occupied by gentlemen who become committee chairmen.

Mr. SIMS. I know; but that does not increase the number of rooms.

Mr. PALMER. It does not increase the number of rooms, but it provides for everybody.

Mr. SIMS. How does it do that if it takes two away from those who now use them?

Mr. PALMER. Has not the gentleman now filed on a particular room?

Mr. SIMS. I have been doing the best I could to find a room on which I might file, not previously filed on by some other Member.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania has accurately stated the manner in which he has been presenting these resolutions to the House. I do not believe anybody can fairly criticize him or impute to him any attempt to assume power or to arrogate to himself or to the Committee on Ways and Means any jurisdiction that does not belong to them. He has stated what I have always understood, and I think properly, has been the practice in the past. I believe, Mr. Speaker, however, that the commission in charge of the House Office Building has certain powers in the premises. For the first time since the House Office Building has been open a controversy arose during the present session of this Congress between several Members about the assignment of rooms, which necessitated the commission to act and determine the controversy. It has been very fortunate that there have not been numerous controversies. The commission in investigating this case appreciated more than at any other time the possibility of very serious personal differences arising from the assignment of rooms in the House Office Building.

The sundry civil bill carries an appropriation for the enlargement of the House Office Building, and the commission at that meeting agreed that hereafter it would assume and exercise the power that the statute seems to have granted and prevent criticism that might arise from the assignment of rooms to one person and another by making recommendations to the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask who has charge of the rooms in the Capitol Building itself?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the rules of the House, the Speaker has the disposition of unassigned space which is in the portion allotted to the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives itself has control of the occupied space. That has been pretty definitely determined. It seems to me, in view of the fact there is apt to be some controversy arising from the substitution of rooms of men who are now chairmen of committees and who must go out, it would perhaps facilitate matters if the gentleman will withdraw his motion——

Mr. HARDWICK. I would like to ask one or the other of the gentlemen, do all these rooms in the Capitol Building become unassigned rooms at the beginning of each Congress?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they do not.

Mr. HARDWICK. They do not hold over from time to time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do, under the precedents and practices of the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. But there is no rule to govern.

Mr. MANN. But the committees hold over their rooms.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there are hundreds of practices and customs in the House for which no specific rule can be found and which are founded on the unbroken action of the House. If it were not for the recognition of those unwritten rules and customs, the House could not do business at all. The rooms assigned by resolution of the House to a committee remain assigned to the committee from one Congress to another until the House by resolution assigns them in some other way. If rooms are vacated—and my recollection is, if space be unoccupied—the rules specifically give to the Speaker the power of the assignment of such rooms.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to make a little contribution to this subject, if I may be permitted. When the House Office Building was approaching completion and the matter came up as to how the rooms should be assigned, which was quite a proposition, I undertook, at the request of various gentlemen of the House, to prepare a resolution for the appointment of a committee, and, rather to my chagrin, was made the chairman of that committee and had charge of the distribution of rooms of the House Office Building. Those who were here at the time will remember that after we had the rooms distributed there was no complaint. The matter had gone along successfully, and I think everybody in the House was satisfied at the time, although the Committee on Ways and Means was not entirely satisfied with what was proposed to be done. As a result of having been the chairman of that committee, I was asked to retain the chairmanship until the end of the Congress, though there was some doubt whether the committee continued to exist; and after the Congress expired gentlemen came to me, the Superintendent of the Capitol, the man who is in charge of the building over there, and constantly Members of the House came to me asking me to offer various resolutions in the House and ask unanimous consent for their consideration. At the beginning of the last Congress, the Democrats being in control of the House, various gentlemen came to me, as they had hitherto, about committee assignments or personal assignments, and I said I did not think it was proper for anybody from the Republican or minority side of the House to offer resolutions in reference to the assignment of rooms, and I asked the gentlemen to see the gentleman from Alabama; and afterwards, when I understood the matter had been turned over to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I constantly referred Members of the House with reference to assignments over there which would require a resolution to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], and I wish to commend him for the work he has done in this regard. Some gentlemen have intimated that he might have assumed authority. Well, it was necessary for somebody to assume authority to do something, because there was no one charged with the work of preparing a proposition for the House.

Now, if the gentleman will permit me, there is a House Office Commission, and I will say that all of these resolutions which were presented by me heretofore were never referred to the House Office Commission. Possibly they ought to have been. But there is now a House Office Commission, consisting of the Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and myself, I having been recently appointed. Possibly my views have changed, although I hope not, on that account. Now, the gentleman offers a resolution in reference to the Roads Committee. The Roads Committee must have a committee room. From information I received yesterday I was inclined to think possibly they might be supplied with a committee room in the Capitol, more convenient and better than the two rooms over there which the gentleman has referred to. Those two rooms are on the east side and, I believe, were reserved from assignment at the beginning because we had a superfluity of rooms at that time and deliberately set aside some rooms for special committees or for future committees that might be created. Now, in the last House you abolished six committees, and you absorbed their rooms at once. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] was not quite as stingy about rooms as I had been, or else more people were more persistent with him than they were with me and got them away from him in some way.

Mr. PALMER. I will say, in response to what the gentleman has said, that some of the committees that were abolished were small and unimportant committees and occupied inside rooms in the Capitol which really were unhabitable.

Mr. MANN. Very few of those committees occupied inside rooms. Most of them had very nice rooms in the Capitol or at the other building. There was no committee left in the House with a poor committee room, unless it was the Committee on Patents over here, which at one time had a poor room, which the committee deliberately elected to keep.

Now, it seems to me that in the assignment of rooms, if we are going to take care of everybody, the House Office Commission ought to make recommendations and take into consideration those matters, because a bill can not be referred to them, or a resolution can not be referred to them, and they can not report a resolution. I think the gentleman had better let this go over and let the House Office Commission or the Speaker see if they or he can not work out this thing so as to provide rooms for the Roads Committee without trenching on anybody else.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I started out to ask a question of the gentleman, but was prevented. I shall not delay the House but a moment. There are only 10 Members of the House who have had longer service than I have had here. I knew, of course, that under the rule I had a right to go and file upon a room according to the length of my service. I knew that I could go and file upon the room recently occupied by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], who is chairman of the Roads Committee, but when I looked into the matter I found that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] had already filed on it, and he is a younger Member in point of service than I. I did not want to file on any room upon which a Member had already filed.

Mr. PALMER. But the gentleman must file in order to get his room.

Mr. SIMS. I know; but I do not think one should file on a room upon which another has filed or file upon a room regardless of the length of service the Member has had.

Mr. PALMER. That is not considered as a ground of offense, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. I know; but I would not like, for instance, to move the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] out of his room, unless he consented, by filing on same.

Mr. PALMER. I will say to the gentleman that he could not move me out unless I consented. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is mistaken about the room he speaks of having been filed upon by me.

Mr. SIMS. I may have made a mistake. I thought I was doing the gentleman from Indiana a courtesy, as I had heard he had filed on the room referred to.

Mr. DIXON. The gentleman probably meant my colleague from Indiana, Mr. Cox.

Mr. SIMS. I meant whoever had filed on Judge SHACKLEFORD'S room, and heard he was Mr. DIXON, but it means the same thing—that some one else had filed on it, and I would not take his place.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, no one has jurisdiction of the assignment of committee rooms, as I understand the rules of the House. When a committee is assigned to a room, that room belongs to it, and nobody can move it out of the room except this House, by resolution passed by this House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, just a moment, if the gentleman will yield to me.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does that go on from Congress to Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is not a matter of law, but a matter of practice?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The committees can not be assigned to rooms two or three Congresses ahead?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but I do not think the gentleman understood what I said. I said that when a committee was assigned a room by Congress the committee occupied the room and held it until otherwise ordered by the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. It just holds on?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The committee files are there, and the clerks are there, and there is no question about it. Now, this House can undoubtedly, by resolution, move any committee in the House out of its present room.

Mr. Speaker, the building of the House Office Building has brought a conflict of jurisdiction about unoccupied space. Under the rules and precedents of this House there is no question that the Speaker has the right to make assignments of the unoccupied space in this portion of the Capitol Building itself, as he elects to do. I am inclined to think that the unoccupied space in the House Office Building can be controlled by the commission that controls that building. But so far as committees are concerned I do not think anybody has jurisdiction over moving a committee, or ought to have such jurisdiction, except this House itself.

Now, this is merely a question of the assignment of a committee, and some one has to move in the matter. No committee has jurisdiction. The Ways and Means Committee has never attempted to assume jurisdiction. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has explained the situation. I having been selected floor leader of my party two years ago, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] came to me then, requesting that I bring before the House the matter of the assignments of committee rooms. I did not have the time. My time was occupied otherwise, and I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] to act for me. Neither of us had jurisdiction, or has it now, but I think that this proposition does not require unanimous consent. It is one of the privileges of the House——

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman would not claim that a resolution introduced in the House does not require to be referred to a committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do claim that when there is no committee to which it can be referred.

Mr. MANN. But there is. There must be a committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; there is not.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, at the only time when that question ever was raised the Chair decided that a resolution precisely like this was a privileged resolution.

Mr. MANN. When was it raised?

Mr. PALMER. It was raised by Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, in this House more than 30 years ago, and that was the only time there ever was a decision on the question.

Mr. MANN. That was before there was a House Office Building, and the law provides in reference to the House Office Building.

Mr. PALMER. Two years ago, when I introduced a similar resolution, I offered it as a privileged resolution, and under the decision which I cited to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] at that time he said it might be that it was privileged, but suggested that I ask unanimous consent, saying that no objection would be made, and I have pursued that policy since.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will pardon me, when the matter was up before, a gentleman now occupying a seat on this floor, who was then the parliamentarian of the House, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], went into the matter very exhaustively, and the committee of which I was chairman was authorized in the resolution which I drafted to report at any time, making its report privileged. That was the only way it could be privileged at that time. That was the ruling then, and has been the ruling ever since.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will pardon me a moment—as I was cut off from finishing my sentence—I do not think there can be any question that this is a privileged resolution. A resolution that relates directly to the membership of this House, a resolution relating to the action of the committees as committees, as a part of the organization of this House, is privileged. A committee can not work, can not perform its functions, unless it has a place in which to perform them. There is unquestionably no committee given jurisdiction of the consideration of this matter. Here is a new committee, created by the House. It has no place in which to do business. Is it subject to any gentleman's will or whim on the floor of this House to say that a committee that has been organized and elected by this House can be prevented from having a place in which it can meet to do business because, forsooth, some gentleman says, "I object"?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is anybody attempting to do that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not saying that anyone is attempting to do it, but I do say that it demonstrates that it is a matter of privilege for this House to determine where the committees of this House shall meet; and I think the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] is clearly in order as a matter of privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] shows that the resolution is not in order at this time. He states that these two rooms are reserved for committee assignments and that they are temporarily occupied. The law provides that unoccupied space in the Office Building—

> Shall be assigned by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, under the direction of the commission, and subject to the control of the House of Representatives.

I stated at the outset that, due to a controversy that had arisen during this session of Congress between several Members, the House Office Building Commission was compelled to determine a very difficult, delicate, and unpleasant question, a question arising between two Members as to which of them should be entitled to particular rooms. Realizing from the investigation that was necessary at that time, from the hearing that was given, after examining the law carefully, that it was a delicate and difficult question, the commission decided that it would facilitate the disposition of space in the House Office Building if the commission exercised the power given to it under the law, and submitted formal recommendations to the House in the future, so as to avoid these controversies.

It was for that reason that I suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he withdraw the resolution for the present; not that I have any desire to prevent the assignment being made to the Committee on Good Roads, not that I desire that the rooms be assigned to some individual or some other person, but because I know that this condition to which the gentleman from Tennessee has called attention is bound to result in a controversy over assignment of rooms to men who have given up the position of committee chairmen. Why should these gentlemen be so persistent at this time in endeavoring to force this resolution? The only request made is that opportunity be given for an investigation by those upon whom the law places some responsibility and power. I can not understand the persistency of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that, so far as I am concerned, I have not even been consulted about the matter. The chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not consult me, and I am only saying that it is a matter of privilege because I think this House must exercise the right and power of places where its committees must meet.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I interrupt the gentleman? I want to call his attention to the situation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me make this statement first. I have no feeling about the matter nor desire to raise any controversy. I stated at the outset that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had accurately stated the manner in which he had taken up this unpleasant task of attempting to reconcile conflicting demands for rooms. I simply suggest that for the purpose of avoiding a more difficult controversy that is likely to come up in the near future this resolution be postponed, as by the time Congress meets at the next session there will be 40 additional rooms to be assigned to members or committees. Unless the House Office Building Commission exercises now the responsibility and power that seems to be imposed upon it and makes the recommendations to the House, at the regular session of Congress there will be a controversy arise over additional rooms that will be unfortunate. It so happens that the Speaker of the House and the gentleman from Illinois and myself are located in this building, away from the controversies that may arise about these rooms. I am suggesting that the gentleman from Pennsylvania withhold the resolution for the present, so as to avoid what I know is likely to be an unfortunate situation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have been the cause of this controversy.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think the gentleman is.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am. After the Committee on Roads was created I went to the Speaker and suggested to him that I would like to have some rooms. He said he was not quite certain how rooms are assigned; that after the House was organized he thought the Capitol Commission had something to do with it; but that on some occasions at the beginning of a session resolutions assigning rooms had been adopted. I went to different Members of the House and asked how I should make application for rooms in which my committee should meet, and among others I went to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], and he, at my instance, offered this resolution in the House to accommodate me and the committee of which I have been elected chairman. I did not know that there would be any controversy about who should introduce it, nor did I know that it would raise any conflict about jurisdiction. I see the situation in which I have put my friend from Pennsylvania. He did this to accommodate me and to accommodate a situation, without any supposition or intimation that there would be any conflict of authority or any question of getting on some one else's preserves. The Ways and Means Committee did not take the matter up; the Ways and Means Committee did not consider it; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania, endeavoring to help me solve a proposition that was presented and needing immediate solution, introduced the resolution which seems to have involved him in this unhappy controversy.

What are the rooms? They are two rooms marked in red on the plat of the first floor.

Mr. COX. What is their number?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Their numbers are at present 153 and 154, but originally they were No. 152 and an unnumbered room on the corner next to the corridor. Here is the resolution that was adopted when we first began to assign rooms, and I will ask the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] while I read it. If we have blundered, he will see that there was no design in it. I read now from the resolution which made these rooms subject to assignment:

> The rooms indicated in red on the plats accompanying this resolution are reserved from allotments herein provided for to individual Members, including the rooms, to wit.

Then follows the numbers of the rooms, and among them are these two rooms. This resolution expressly provides that they are not subject to assignment to any Member, and the commission of which the gentleman is a member would have no authority to put anybody in them and has no control of it for any other purpose than to assign the rooms to committees. I understand that these rooms have been temporarily occupied by certain gentlemen as tenants at will. They have gone in there stating they knew they were not subject to individual assignment and that they took them with full knowledge that they must give them up whenever they were called upon to do so. The resolution from which I have just read expressly says that the commission has no authority to award these rooms to any individual Member. They are reserved for a committee. Reading that, talking with different people, I began to see if I could find a way to get possession of those rooms for public use, not intending to trench upon the privileges of my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], nor of my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], nor of the Speaker. I simply wanted a roof; I wanted a place where my boys on my committee could come in out of the rain, and I found an unoccupied piece of territory, and the first gentleman who lent me a willing ear was my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER]. He seems now to be having a great deal of trouble for showing an accommodating disposition to me. I assure gentlemen that there was no scheme in it, no committee back of it, nothing but my disposition to get some rooms that looked good that were unoccupied which would be serviceable for my committee. That is how it all happened. If there is anybody to blame, lay it on my unhappy head, for I am the man that is solely responsible for getting the gentleman from Pennsylvania into this trouble.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything improper about it. I made a suggestion that I thought would save considerable trouble. If it has stirred up trouble here, that can not be helped.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] talks about an unhappy condition. I do not see anything out of the way about having a matter of this sort considered at this time so that Members may better understand the rights of Members in reference to rooms. There is nothing unhappy about the fact that the gentleman has been made the chairman of a great committee and wants a room; there is nothing unhappy in the fact that we have the right to consider how the rooms shall be granted.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Always.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I interpreted some of the words that have been uttered here this morning as a reflection on my friend from Pennsylvania for having taken a hand in this proposition.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has received more encomiums upon his work in this regard than I have received in many months [laughter and applause], and more than the gentleman from Missouri will ever receive while he is chairman of the Committee on Roads.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—now, the gentleman from Missouri called attention to a resolution which was adopted by the House before the assignment of rooms was made at all. That is the resolution which I drew and submitted to the House for the purpose of reserving certain rooms from assignment to individual Members. That included the committee rooms which are in the House and a number of other rooms; but long ago that resolution expired, and its efficacy expired because the law that was passed subsequently to that time provides—it went through the House and Senate and was signed by the President of the United States:

> Unoccupied space in said building shall be assigned by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds under the direction of the commission and subject to the control of the House of Representatives.

And to say that gentlemen who are occupying space over there which was reserved by the original resolution are occupying it in defiance of such legislation is a draft upon the imagination. The House Office Commission and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds had the authority to assign any unoccupied space in the House Office Building. If this space has been assigned, and it was temporarily assigned, I am not sure but the gentlemen went in with the statement that they could only occupy it temporarily. Now, a word, Mr. Speaker, as to whether this resolution is privileged. We have not had very much filibustering in the House of Representatives for many years; but in those days when there was no effort to count a quorum and when the minority intended to prevent business by breaking a quorum while sitting in their seats, the question of what was a privileged resolution was highly important, and the importance of the question has not yet ceased. If the Speaker shall hold that the resolution offered from the floor of the House changing the assignment of rooms is privileged, we can have 50 privileged resolutions here any time when the minority of the House desire to prevent the transaction of business, and on each one of them you can have the previous question and a roll call. From the old days of filibustering privileged resolutions have been cut short. The right to offer a resolution from the floor and have it disposed of without reference to a committee has been invariably denied, except in matters of the highest privilege. I do not believe that the House ought to make a precedent now of saying that a resolution concerning the assignment of committee rooms is privileged, offered from the floor, so that it must be disposed of at the time, giving the minority complete control of the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold his objection for a moment——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. While I make this statement. In view of the fact I have offered the resolution and various gentlemen have passed some remarks upon the manner in which it was submitted, I want to say just this: The resolution which was offered in the House in 1907, prepared by the committee of which the gentleman from Illinois was chairman, distinctly provided that certain rooms should be excepted from the allotments then made. Included in those excepted rooms were those two rooms now covered by the present resolution. Now, the statute provides, as the gentleman from Illinois declares, that unoccupied space in the House Office Building shall be assigned by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds and by the commission having direction of the House Office Building——

Mr. MANN. By the Superintendent of Capitol Building and Grounds under the direction of the House Office Building Commission.

Mr. PALMER. Now, under the act this portion of the unoccupied space in the House Office Building was assigned to Members of the House for their offices——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. PALMER. Just a moment; I am stating the facts.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think that is incorrect.

Mr. PALMER. Well, those gentlemen who now occupy these offices got them because the representative of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds in the House Office Building, Mr. Wooley, allowed them to file upon them, and therefore assigned them that space. Those rooms having been thus occupied are no longer occupied space within the control of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds. It is absolutely intolerable to think that Members of the House who secured their rooms in that fashion could be turned out and committees put in their place except by a resolution of the House, and that is the legal justification for this resolution.

Now, just one minute more. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says that he can not understand my persistency in pressing this resolution. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] has stated the history of the resolution. I am not unduly persistent. I offered the resolution, asked unanimous consent for it, and supposed that it would go through after the purpose of it had been explained and the necessity explained, as similar resolutions always went through during the Sixty-second Congress. I have absolutely no interest in it, directly or indirecty. I do not care "two raps and a hurrah" whether the Committee on Roads ever gets a committee room or not. [Applause.] It does not make any difference to me, but I think that Members generally expect that they shall have a habitation and a home, and in order to provide for that desire of Members I introduced this resolution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want this authority which gentlemen think I have assumed of seeing various people in the House and thrashing out this question generally. I shall be most happy if it shall be assumed by the House Office Commission, whose members upon the floor are making such a strong bid for the authority. I shall be pleased if in future all such resolutions assigning committees to rooms or changing committee-room assignments shall be made upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] or of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who are members of the House Office Commission, along with the Speaker, and I shall not, therefore, introduce any more of these resolutions.

But permit me to suggest to the gentlemen who are members of this important commission that is about to be clothed with this additional important authority and power that when they come to examine this question and study it as carefully as I have done, I am satisfied that they will put the Committee on Roads or suggest that that committee be put in these two rooms—Nos. 153 and 154; and I would like to suggest that you let this resolution go through. You can not give it much more investigation than has been given to it now upon the floor of the House. Members can not become much better acquainted with it than they now are. Let the Committee on Roads move into these two rooms, and in future the Office Building Commission may take this job and welcome.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and that is the end of it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the right of objection for a moment. I attempted to be very courteous to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER]. I commended him for what he had done in reference to this matter.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman has not misunderstood me as intimating that I thought otherwise.

Mr. MANN. But it was evidently lost upon the gentleman. He has endeavored to reflect upon the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and myself for our action in the House to-day. In the heat of debate he has said what he ought not to have said, and in a moment of childishness he said, "I will not introduce another resolution; I will not play in your backyard if I can not have my way." [Laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. That is the gentleman's tone to the House.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Not just now. Reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he had better take back what he said about not offering another resolution in the House.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman makes suggestions about what I ought to do and refuses to yield to me, it is not fair. I might be going to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I say, the gentleman has performed a useful service in this regard, and I say that, notwithstanding the attitude which the gentleman assumes toward the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and myself, as though we were interested in this matter personally, which is not the case at all. The House Office Commission has some responsibility concerning the House. We have disputes to settle once in a while concerning rooms and a good many other things. In all courtesy to the House Office Commission, which has these matters in charge, these resolutions should be submitted to the House Office Commission before they are presented to the House, to see whether those gentlemen representing the House, in charge of the House Office Building, have objections to a proposition and can give valid reasons why the proposition ought not to go through.

I have no objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] offering a resolution. Quite the contrary. I hope he will keep it up and take charge of the matter. But when he does so, I hope, before he submits it to the House, he will submit it to those who have authority over the building, to see what they would suggest in regard to it, instead of submitting a resolution here at the request of any gentleman or Member who asks him to do it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PALMER. I had no intention of being discourteous to the gentleman from Illinois, for whom, as he knows, I have the very highest respect; and if I said anything which could be considered as a discourtesy, either to him or to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I gladly withdraw it. But I meant exactly what I said [laughter]—I meant what I said when I said I would not introduce any other resolution of this character. I think it is a thankless job, and no Member ought to be put in the position of being criticized for performing a function in which he has no interest and concerning which no duty devolves upon him. The gentleman suggests that I should continue to do all the work and get up these resolutions, smooth out the difficulties, get the committees together and everybody pleased, and then come and get the O. K. of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Illinois. I prefer to let them do the work, and they can come to the House and get our O. K.

Mr. MANN. The truth is we do the work now. All you did was to present in the House without examination a resolution prepared for you. We are doing the work now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and that is the end of it.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 128.

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or such subcommittees as they may designate, shall have leave to sit during the sessions of the House during the Sixty-third Congress and during the recesses of that Congress, and authority is granted to do all printing and binding for said committee deemed necessary in connection with the subjects considered by it during the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 32, and to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 32, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. BARTLETT. Reserving the right to object, let us hear what the bill is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will make his request to take this bill from the Speaker's table and consider it in the House at this time, I shall not object. Perhaps we can dispose of the amendments.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman know what the amendments are?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to say that I shall be obliged to object, unless the bill first goes to the committee, so there will not be any need to do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move——

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the point of order on the gentleman's motion——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has not made his motion yet.

Mr. CARLIN. I move that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the Senate amendments be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] moves to take House bill 32 with Senate amendments from the Speaker's table and to consider the bill and amendments in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDWICK. On that motion I make the point of order that under the rule, when a Senate amendment has to be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the bill goes automatically to the committee in charge of the subject matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Virginia on the point of order.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, there could be no doubt on this question if the bill had been reported from the committee in the first place.

Mr. MANN. This is a House bill, not a Senate bill.

Mr. CARLIN. I understand; but it was considered under a special rule and not reported from a committee.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman does not claim that that abrogates the rule now that the committees have been appointed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Virginia will indulge the Chair a moment, the Chair will call his attention to paragraph 2 of Rule XXIV, which states that:

House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine.

Now, as this bill creates an office, it does require consideration in Committee of the Whole; and therefore unless the gentleman has some authority of which the Chair is not informed the Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. That being the rule, would it not be in order that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Senate amendments to this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; it would not; because the rule provides that bills of this character shall automatically be referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. PALMER. The Speaker has just read the rule, which provides that the bill shall go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will read the whole rule, if the gentleman desires it:

Reports and communications from heads of departments and other communications addressed to the House, and bills, resolutions, and messages from the Senate may be referred to the appropriate committees in the same manner and with the same right of correction as public bills presented by Members; but House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine.

This is a bill which does require consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PALMER. But there is nothing in the rule which says that a House bill with committee amendments when it comes back from the Senate must first go to the committee. It must go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and therefore I submit that a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Senate amendments would be in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair differs with the gentleman, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will pardon me, I will call his attention to a part of the rule which I think he did not read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not read it because it did not seem to be necessary.

Mr. MANN. It is as follows:

Reports and communications from heads of departments, and other communications addressed to the House, and bills, resolutions, and messages from the Senate may be referred to the appropriate committees in the same manner and with the same right of correction as public bills presented by Members.

Mr. PALMER. This is not a bill from the Senate. This is a House bill with Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. This is a bill from the Senate. The gentleman is mistaken. This is not a Senate bill, but it is a House bill with a message from the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no question about the practice, in section 861 the following authority is given:

A House bill returned with Senate amendments involving a new matter of appropriation, whether with or without a request for a conference, is referred directly to a standing committee, and on being reported therefrom is referred directly to the Committee of the Whole.

There are cited several authorities taken from volume 4, Hinds' Precedents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt that the Chair is correct in his ruling, and sustains the point of order.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR DIFFERENT COMMITTEES.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 124.

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce shall be, and is hereby, authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to have such printing and binding done as may be required for the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 127.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-third Congress is authorized to have such printing and binding done for the use of the committee as may be necessary for the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 126.

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business; that the Committee on Naval Affairs and the subcommittees thereof have authority to sit during the sessions of the House and during the recesses of the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

MOTIONS TO DISCHARGE COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 125.

Resolved, That for and during the remainder of the first session of the Sixty-third Congress the operation of clause 4 of Rule XXVII of the House of Representatives shall be suspended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, this resolution is to prevent the operation of the committee discharge rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. During the remainder of the present session.

Mr. MANN. During the remainder of the present session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, if he will allow me and the gentleman from Georgia will yield——

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That a resolution was passed through the Democratic caucus yesterday providing the program for this side of the House for the present and possibly for the session. That program provided that none of the standing committees shall report bills or resolutions back to the calendar except the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Elections, the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Accounts, in order that this session might be confined, as far as practicable, to the consideration of the tariff bill and possibly to the consideration of a currency bill if the Committee on Banking and Currency sees proper to report one. I understand that it will be necessary for the Committee on Appropriations to bring in a deficiency bill before the end of the session. Now, that being the case, this side of the House has taken the responsibility of saying to the country that it confines the legislation of the House to the subject matters coming from those committees. There is a Discharge Calendar. Of course, bills could be referred to the committees, and if they were not reported at the proper time a motion could be made to discharge the committee under the Discharge Calendar proposition.

Now, two years ago we were in this condition when we concluded to limit the work of the extra session largely to tariff matters, but we avoided the Discharge Calendar by adjournment over. I think this is simpler and easier and more satisfactory. We do not propose to allow motions to discharge committees that have been prohibited from reporting to be made, and therefore we desire to pass a resolution suspending the operation of the Discharge Calendar for this session—not permanently, but for this session. Of course, I recognize the fact——

Mr. MANN. Was this referred to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. HARDWICK. It was not referred to the Committee on Rules, simply because it was the caucus action, and it was mere formality to refer it. If anybody objects, that committee will take it up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, it could be carried to the Committee on Rules. It has been approved by the Democratic caucus, and we have enough votes to put it through if the gentleman from Illinois prefers to do it that way. But if we can get this resolution through at this time, I would like to see if I can enter into a compact with the gentleman from Illinois about adjournment for some weeks.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the resolution again reported.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, we suspend the operation of the whole rule——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No——

Mr. GARDNER. Allow me to state my question. What I want to get at is this: Whether we will be permitted two weeks from to-day to file motions to discharge and have them pending, or whether we can not file those motions to discharge until the next session? That is very important.

Mr. HARDWICK. The entire fourth clause of the rule is suspended. We did not see any need of letting in a lot of these motions when they could not be taken up, and we have just suspended that part of the rule that relates to the Discharge Calendar.

Mr. GARDNER. I quite agree that the gentleman is right in prohibiting the filing of these motions; but has the gentleman considered whether these motions can be filed the first day of the next session, or must we wait 14 days in the next session before it makes provision for their filing?

Mr. HARDWICK. Clause I provides for during the remainder of the present session. It says so in so many words.

Mr. MANN. The rule is:

> Any Member may present to the Clerk a motion in writing to discharge a committee from further consideration of any public bill or joint resolution which may have been referred to such committee 15 days prior thereto.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly. Now, we have suspended that——

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; but could you put it in operation on the first day of the next session, or would it go to those bills which have been before the committees at this session more than 15 days?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the idea.

Mr. MANN. Now, if the gentleman will permit, I recognize the fact that the Democratic side of the House is in a majority and has the right to determine whether or not they will transact any business except certain special business at a special session of Congress; and of course if they make that determination and both sides of the House agree in reference to what business shall be transacted as the weeks go along, so that Members have greater liberty about being present, it would be perfectly fair in connection with that to make a further agreement or have a rule so that the minority could not embarrass the majority about this Committee Discharge Calendar. I think that would be perfectly fair. But what is the gentleman's intention now with reference to future meetings of the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], if he is present——

Mr. MANN. He is here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That they enter into an agreement that after to-day no business shall be transacted in the House except what can be done by unanimous consent—ordinary orders, and things of that kind—and that we adjourn for three days at a time until Monday, the 23d day of June.

Mr. MANN. Let us have that agreement, coupled with the unanimous consent.

Mr. MURDOCK. And 45 minutes to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There would be no question about gentlemen making speeches. That could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Of course we know you have the power to do this. But the power to do a thing is one thing and unanimous consent is quite another. I have seen occasions when, out of courtesy to that side of the House, I permitted a resolution to be considered by unanimous consent, only to be reviled a few minutes thereafter by some Member on that side of the House because it had gone through by unanimous consent, although the minority had allowed it, per force, on account of force or numbers. But suppose hereafter, after the 23d day of June, and along about the 23d day of September we commence to transact all kinds of business. Would the gentleman then be willing to have the committee-discharge rule put in force again?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if we were doing general business and the blanket was lifted so that committees could report their bills to the House, I think it would be proper to lift the practice, but so long as we are prohibited from reporting bills from committees to the House by caucus resolution, I think it is the duty of the Members on this side to protect those committees.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the leader of the majority in reference to that. I do not think it would be fair to their side of the House to permit their committees to be annoyed by motions discharging committees from the consideration of bills which they could not report.

Of course the committee-discharge rule always was buncombe. [Laughter on the Republican side.] No committee ever was discharged under it. No vote ever was taken under it, I believe, except once, when I caught them without a quorum and got the Speaker to rule—erroneously—that we had a right to have a roll call. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman speaks in his characteristic way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire, before we go further, to see if we can enter into a compact which will not interfere with the gentleman's unanimous-consent resolution, because it is not expected that it shall interfere with unanimous consent. I assume that either the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] or his representative, or the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] or one of his representatives, will be on the floor at every session between now and the 23d of June to object to anything coming up except ordinary orders that are necessary to take, and therefore I ask unanimous consent—no; I will not make it unanimous consent—I will ask, without unanimous consent, if I can have an understanding with the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Kansas such as we entered into a few weeks ago?

Mr. MANN. What business is it that the gentleman expects would come up?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not expect any business to come up.

Mr. MANN. Of course, there is the sundry civil bill, which is in conference, and the Indian appropriation bill, which is in the Senate, and an emergency or urgent deficiency bill, which will probably be reported. The gentleman did not mention a report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; but something must be done in reference to the Commerce Court, either by legislation or an appropriation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it that question could not come up within these three weeks.

Mr. MANN. It may have to come up within the three weeks.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is no money to pay for the running of the court after the 1st of July.

Mr. MANN. There is no money to run the court, and no other court has jurisdiction of the questions which the Commerce Court was created to consider.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That would come from the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. MANN. It would unless the court was abolished.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think under the circumstances, while this side of the House are not many of them in favor of abolishing the court, yet if it is the determination of that side of the House to abolish the court, probably the point of no quorum would not be raised. I should not raise it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama about the MacDonald election case.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I assume that it will take at least three weeks for the Election Committees to prepare, hear, and thrash out these election cases. If the MacDonald election case was reported within these three weeks and unanimous consent was given for its consideration, why then it would be proper to consider it. But if it was not, I think it would have to go over until after the 23d day of June.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Kansas if he knows whether the testimony in the MacDonald election case has been printed or not?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not. I understand it is completed.

Mr. MANN. Some time ago I suggested to the Speaker that he order that testimony printed, so that it might expedite the hearing of the case. Of course under the law the Clerk of the House calls in the parties and determines what is to be printed. I do not know whether that has been done, but somebody who is interested in the case ought to see that it is done, and done speedily.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand that is the duty of the Clerk.

Mr. MANN. It is the duty of the Clerk to print it, and I suggested to the Speaker some time ago that he suggest to the Clerk that it be printed.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is not his purpose to have that case concluded as soon as possible?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I personally have no purpose in the matter, but I understand it is the purpose of this side of the House to see that a speedy and early hearing of that case is had, so that it may be disposed of. If there is a contest about it, it is apparent that it could not come up between now and the 23d of June, because there will not be a quorum here; but if there is no contest about it, then I see no objection to taking it up.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then there is no objection to considering it immediately after the reconvening on June 23?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; and if the committee are ready to make their report, it can be considered before that time if nobody objects.

Mr. MANN. Then, as I understand it, we have a gentlemen's understanding that there will be no business except emergency business transacted between now and the 23d of June, except possibly such ordinary business as may come up by unanimous consent?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. How about the bill for the additional judgeship in Pennsylvania, which went to the Judiciary Committee this morning?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The committee are prohibited from reporting that bill without caucus action.

Mr. MANN. It has not been sent to the committee yet probably.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will have to come up by unanimous consent in the House, and I take it that the committee would not attempt to go to the Democratic caucus and ask unanimous consent to report that bill; but I will say, speaking for my side of the House, that if that was done, this rule would not be violated by its being brought up from the committee before the 23d.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then I understand that in addition there is a measure in the Senate having to do with midshipmen, which bill has recently passed the Senate or is about to pass it.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is here now in the House.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman specially concerned about that bill?

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all, but I have been asked about it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has named the 23d of June.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman about that bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It certainly would not come up before the 23d of June.

Mr. MANN. It might be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. MURDOCK. It comes within the range of unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it comes in here with a request for unanimous consent I expect that the gentleman from Kansas, if he is opposed to it, will have a representative here to object, or the gentleman from Illinois, in case he is opposed to it.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know that I am opposed to it, but it comes within the range of unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman spoke of the 23d day of June. That comes at about the date when the sweet girl graduates are coming out. There is a great deal of incentive to be present at college presentments, both of girls and boys. Would it be practical to make the date a little later than the 23d day of June, so that it would not interfere with that delightful occupation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state why I fixed that date. I do not know at present how much progress is being made on the tariff bill in the Senate, or how much will be made. In the next place, I do not know what action the Banking and Currency Committee may want to take. That gives us a week in between the 23d day of June and the 4th day of July. I understand that there is a celebration at Gettysburg, and that a great many Members of the House would like to attend that celebration. I think by our coming back here and starting afresh on the 23d of June we could then determine whether we would have to stay here and do business or whether we can go over the 4th of July and these celebrations.

Mr. MANN. Of course we will not have a quorum until after the 4th of July unless there is some emergency. Is it understood that the President will send in a message on banking and currency very soon?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I can not speak with any authority, but that is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. And it will then be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR CERTAIN COMMITTEES.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 131.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be, and is hereby, authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter written by Mr. W. B. Thompson, commissioner of public utilities in New Orleans, on the subject of the improvement of the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article is as follows:

LET GOVERNMENT FIRST ASSUME RIVER CONTROL—W. B. THOMPSON, COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC UTILITIES, THINKS THE CAREFULLY ORGANIZED DEMONSTRATION IN FAVOR OF NEWLANDS BILL SHOULD BE REGRETTED—SAYS THAT HOPES AND FEARS OF DISTRESSED PEOPLE OF MISSISSIPPI VALLEY SHOULD NOT BE CAPITALIZED.

Relative to the mass meeting of last Thursday night, where the Newlands river regulation bill was indorsed, W. B. Thompson, commissioner of public utilities, Monday gave out a statement as follows:

"The carefully organized demonstration in favor of the Newlands bill enacted in this city on last Thursday night should be regretted. It is particularly unfortunate, just at the time when the moral sense of the Nation is beginning to recognize that the menace of the Mississippi River is a national problem, and to appreciate that the curbing of this destructive force is a national obligation, that the beneficiaries of governmental support should be found squabbling among themselves as to the particular ways and means whereby salvation shall be administered. And it is not only unfortunate, but wholly inexcusable, that the hopes and fears of the distressed people of the Mississippi Valley should be capitalized for the furtherance of any particular legislative scheme, however comprehensive such scheme may be in its scope or however meritorious it may be in some of its particular provisions.

"As a citizen of Louisiana I am deeply interested in the problem of flood prevention, and as a private individual my fortunes depend upon the protection of our lands from overflow. I am fully aware that the protective system as presently developed is inadequate. Something more must be done than has been done, and whatever is attempted must be better done. I am fully convinced that the desired consummation can not be attained except through the application of special knowledge under the administration of centralized authority and provided with ample means, and I believe, with the utmost confidence, that no agency other than the Federal Government can ever cope with the tremendous natural difficulties of the situation or realize the maxims of benefit derivable from human effort. But, having reached the conclusion that the General Government can and must supply the needed protection, I do not undertake to dogmatize as to the technical means whereby the protective measures shall be applied. My general knowledge of the situation leads me to believe that if the river channel is kept open and the flow therein persistent, if the banks are reenforced and strengthened, if the levees are built to a designated height and specification, and if the natural avenues of relief are utilized and improved, then we may expect such immunity as the Almighty intended that we should have.

THEORIES MENTIONED.

"Whether the 'levees only' theory, or the 'outlet' theory, or the 'reservoir' theory, or the 'reforestation and denudation' theory, or any other theory or any other combination of theories is the best, I am unable to determine. And I consider that I, or any other average layman who undertakes to theorize and dogmatize as to these particulars, not only wastes time which might be employed to better purpose, but interferes with the efficiency of the efforts of those who know what they are doing. If we can induce the United States Government to take over the river problem and administer the system of protection, with such material assistance as we who are directly affected may contribute, I shall be wholly satisfied to leave the theory of the system, as well as the details of operation, to the judgment and skill of the experts appointed to handle the same. And furthermore, in the primary issue of inducing the Government to assume charge of the system, or in the interim to render the maximum of aid, I am distinctly in favor of being guided by the judgment of our Representatives in Congress, who are in intimate touch with the legislative situation and fully qualified to gauge the same, rather than to hamper and embarrass these Representatives by demonstrations garnished by raw-meat-and-bloody-bones oratory and stereopticon melodramas.

"The inveterate disposition of the average man to meddle with details about which he is ignorant, to express his opinion upon subjects concerning which he has a sensation as contradistinguished from a thought, and to become a noisy claquer to issues which he does not personally understand, is perhaps the most serious drawback to popular government, and is without doubt the soil in which most specious legislative projects are propagated. The mass meeting of Thursday night was called for the ostensible purpose of strengthening by popular support the broad movement for Federal jurisdiction of the river problem. To such a summons every man and woman in the Mississippi Valley could enthusiastically respond. But when the crowd had been assembled and duly impressed with the importance and necessity of Federal aid and control the real purpose of the meeting developed, to wit, the indorsement of one of the most extraordinary legislative nostrums of modern times or of any time. The Newlands bill, a measure industriously promoted hereabouts, was the honoree of the occasion. A measure frankly demagogic in its construction and appeal and visionary, utopian, and futile in its promise was, over the respectful protest and earnest request for a hearing on the part of our two United States Senators, summarily indorsed.

DEMONSTRATION INEFFECTIVE.

"Such a demonstration can have no effect in so far as the ultimate fortunes of the Newlands bill are concerned, but by embarrassing our Representatives in Washington and creating the specious impression that their efforts are repudiated by the people of this section, such a demonstration can, and no doubt will, work incalculable injury to the general movement for Federal protection upon which we are all united. And the sentiment of these set demonstrations is notoriously fickle. If our Representatives should allow themselves to be deflected from their well considered course in endeavoring to secure $60,000,000 for river protection through the regular channels of legislation and run after this new thing under the sun promising (if adopted) one hundred million, there is no assurance but that another mass meeting would result in different and contrary instructions. Even one of the leaders in the present pro-Newlands movement has changed his opinion as to river protection within the past eight months. Only so long ago as September, 1912, he declared that out of the ripeness of his experience and the abundance of his knowledge he had reached an absolute faith and confidence in the efficacy of the levee system as the best, the surest, and the only protection against the recurring overflows of the lower river. And yet in May, 1913, we find this same leader threatening our Senators and Representatives with political excommunication if they do not abandon the policy which in September he had declared to be the only way, and if they do not at once join in the heroic effort to force into Uncle Sam's fiscal system the compound cathartic pill concocted by a devoted band of claimers, reclaimers, conservators, and constructionists. If our leaders are thus variable, what may we expect of the unthinking hoi polloi? If our bedeviled Representatives should hearken unto this fierce command, could they not reasonably fear that another popular assembly might shortly order the Newlands bill to the scrap heap and declare for some newer and still more progressive, constructive, and promising measure which would undertake to regulate the solar system and utilize hydraulic pressure for the painless removal of the vermiform appendix?

FOR THOSE CURIOUS.

"If happily this communication should reach the attention of any of the constituents of the said mass meeting and should awaken in such some slight movement of curiosity as to what, perchance, the Newlands bill might really comprehend, perhaps the perusal of the following extract from the measure, setting out the objects and purposes of the same and specifying what the board created thereby will do, may be of interest:

"'That the board will develop, formulate, prepare, consider, and determine upon comprehensive plans for the conservation, use, and development of the water and forest resources of the United States in such manner as will best regulate the flow of source streams and navigable rivers, and embracing with that object flood protection, drainage, and the reclamation of swamp and overflow lands; water storage in natural and artificial reservoirs; the beneficial use of waters for irrigation and for all domestic, municipal, and industrial purposes; the maintenance and development of underground water supplies and the storage of waters in the ground and in irrigated lands and underground reservoirs; the enlargement of the areas and raising of the levels of the ground waters; the construction of flood-water canals, bypasses and restraining dams; the control and regulation of drainage and the replenishment of streams by return seepage; the perpetuation of forests and maintenance of woodland cover as sources of stream flow; the prevention of denudation and erosion; the protection of river channels from eroded soil materials; the clarification of streams; the utilization of water power; the prevention of the pollution of streams and rivers; the sanitary disposal of sewage and purification of water supplies; the best distribution of forests, woodlands, and other growth and of cultivated and irrigated areas in their relation to river flow; the protection of forested and woodland areas from destruction by fire or insects; the reforestation of denuded areas; the planting of forests and establishment of forest plantations; the preservation and planting of woodlands and any other growth and protective cover on watersheds; the increase and development of the porosity and absorbent qualities and storage capacity of the soil upon which rain or snow may fall; the making and furnishing of plans for flood-water storage and other works of irrigation, and power for farms, towns, and villages; the acquisition, subdivision, and settlement in small, intensively cultivated farms of lands for water storage by irrigation; the building of the irrigation systems for such lands, including reservoirs, dams, canals, ditches, and all necessary works; the protection of farms, villages, towns, and municipalities from damage by freshets and overflow; the impounding of flood waters in artificial lakes and storage reservoirs to prevent floods and overflows, erosion, and low-water periods, the ultimate object of all such work being to regulate and, so far as possible, standardize the flow of navigable rivers and source streams, and in the accomplishment of that object to induce and secure the cooperation of States, municipalities, districts, counties, towns, and other agencies and organizations.'"

PROGRAM NOT SIMPLE.

"Here we have a symposium indeed. The program proposed for the Newlands board is not nearly so simple as the formation of an empire or the organization of a republic. Compared with the possibilities of this prospectus John Law's Mississippi company was a mere adventure with a peanut stand. The board would require an army of employees, and each one of the items of activity would call for a subboard, and in many cases the number of boards would be multiplied by the number of operation units in the vast area covered. Take, for instance, the modest and inconspicuous item, 'the utilization of the water power.' This means nothing or else it means an undertaking so stupendous that the practical mind is staggered in the attempt to comprehend it. A board to utilize the water power of the United States! How? 'For beneficial use in all domestic, municipal, and industrial purposes.' Every town, city, and locality in the United States susceptible to the beneficial utilization of water power would be within the purview of this board or of one of its subdivisions, and all the inhabitants of each would have a warrant under the promise of the bill to clamor for governmental aid in the development of water power for their particular domestic, municipal, or industrial profit. This function alone, if effected, would involve an organization more complex than any of the present departments of the Federal Government and would require for its maintenance and support the resources of a Monte Cristo. But it may be said that, of course, this provision is not to be taken literally or logically. Then, I answer that it means nothing, and is the mere ebullition of a surcharged vocabulary or else is a plank in the platform to attract the favorable attention of localities partial to expenditure of money by the Government for 'constructive' purposes.

"The foregoing is but one of the minor objects or incidents of the bill. All the rivers and waterways on the continent are to be controlled from source to mouth, and instead of shrinking from the roaring torrents of destruction which have hitherto washed our valleys, the people shall hear only the hushed murmurs of hydrostatic equilibrium and repose. Lakes of pure microbeless fluid shall be provided in appropriate situations for the delectation, comfort, and financial gain of the happy beneficiaries of this bill. Subterranean storage basins, channels, and labyrinths are to be provided, into which the overplus of surface moisture shall be condensed and sluiced under thirsty fields.

SANDS OF THE DESERT.

"The sands of the desert shall be by the alchemy of legislation converted into fecund alluvia. Forests shall spring from hitherto denuded areas, jungles shall hear the farmer's joyful salutation, woodlands shall skip from hill to dale and from dale to hill, and the sophisticated citizen shall view with composure the phenomenon which so affrighted the Thane of Cawdor when Birnam wood came marching on to Dunsinane. And not content with these more obvious works of improvement our legislative benefactors would charge the board with the duty of increasing the porosity of the soil, lest old Mother Earth, through abstraction or neglect, should permit her capillaries to become clogged to the detriment of the complete harmony of the occasion. We have here a formula which makes the nebular hypothesis look like a sum in simple addition. It is the new genesis. As nearly as I can judge, it takes care of all the imminent ills except the boll weevil, votes for women, and infant damnation, and I am not sure but that under the doctrine of contemporaneous construction even these burning problems may be included with its purview and dissolved.

"When I have made inquiry of local advocates of the measure in question, as to the reason for the omnibus scope of its provisions; as to why so great a variety of objects and purposes should be enumerated; so many diverse interests considered, so extended a territory provided for, and the door of opportunity thrown open to so many different claimants, all in one mastodonic draft upon the Treasury, I have been informed by way of answer that it was deemed necessary to enlist the sympathy of practically the entire country in order that the huge appropriation might be voted by Congress. I have been told, furthermore, that perhaps the bill was not perfect, perhaps it would have to be pruned down or shaped up, but in any event, I have been advised, I should not interest myself in extraneous features so long as we of the Mississippi Valley were provided for in a generous appropriation for river protection.

MOTIVES NOT QUESTIONED.

"While I do not question the motives of any of these advocates, and while I accord to them the same sincerity of purpose, motive, and conviction that I claim for myself, still I am compelled to declare that in my humble judgment this is not the proper basis for demands upon the Public Treasury. The standard of such legislation is at best the standard of mere opportunism. I am very far from wishing to deprive the citizens of other sections of the United States of the governmental protection and support to which their situation and needs entitle them, and if I had a vote I would unhesitatingly and eagerly give it to any meritorious and proper application, no matter from what section or interest it might proceed. I will go further and say that, in my opinion, the General Government fails to discharge its full obligation to other sections and to other public interests, as well as to our own. But when it comes to taking money from the Treasury for such purposes I am very much afraid that an appropriation bill, constructed upon the vote-getting principle stated, with its provisions and scope of sufficient variety and elasticity to invest it with the quality of universal appeal, will inevitably include within the objects of disbursement causes which, upon their own merits, would utterly fail to secure recognition. In other words, if in a bill carrying gigantic appropriations we attach to the several main issues an indefinite variety of adjuncts, and then jumble the whole matter together into one mass and attach thereto a common tail which sweeps the continent and embraces all the ramifications of natural science from pork barreling to porosity, we are almost sure to admit a quota of undesirable customers or at least to invite the assiduous attention of the horde of anxious inquirers.

"An appropriation bill should be definite in its objects and specific in its provisions, leaving little to construction and nothing to cupidity. A bill appropriating a sum of money to be used for the purpose of investigating certain specific problems and formulating specific recommendations and appropriate plans is a perfectly proper act of legislation; and after such investigation has been made and a report submitted advising the amount of expenditure necessary to carry out the specific purpose in view, it is entirely in order for the legislature to approve the plans and make the specific appropriation of funds necessary to give the project effect; but it is neither logical nor wise nor right to appoint a commission for the purpose of considering a variety of problems related to national and local welfare and by the same act to appropriate a collossal fund of the people's money to be expended upon plans not yet developed and in ways not yet determined.

POINT ILLUSTRATED.

"An educational bill, for instance, carrying an appropriation for its logical purpose, is of course eminently proper; and so is a bill appointing a commission to examine into the habitat and habits of parasitic insects, and carrying an appropriation necessary for the purpose thereof; but we would look with entire disfavor and with some suspicion upon an attempt to provide for such commission in an educational bill and to include in the appropriation carried by the bill a sum adequate to make effective such plans as said insect commission might hereafter formulate to prevent red bugs and other pests from biting, chewing, and otherwise harrassing the school children of the Nation in their quest for knowledge. Unless I am mistaken and misinformed, the Newlands bill, recognizing the urgent necessity and popular demand for flood prevention, appropriates $300,000,000 for this specific purpose, which includes for the Mississippi River, from St. Louis to the Gulf, one hundred million to be expended for levees, reservoirs, dams, lakes, source regulation, etc. But in the same bill two hundred million additional is appropriated. Of this amount fifty million is specifically apportioned for the purchase of additional forest lands, leaving one hundred and fifty millions indiscriminately applicable, in manner, form, and terms not specified to the purposes of investigation and research and to projects of reclamation, irrigation, power supply, purification, land purchases, insect destruction, porosity, and other several items and causes enumerated.

"We have no means of knowing how soon, if ever, the Newlands bill will become a law. Its passage in the near future, however, is by no means assured. In the meantime I am convinced that for those of us with whom flood prevention is the primary and paramount issue, it is best that we stand solidly behind our Senators and Representatives in their direct and specific effort to secure the appropriation of $60,000,000 for the work in hand, and that we, in concert with all the inhabitants of the flood-menaced sections, make common cause to hasten the inevitable day when the United States Government shall perceive its duty and recognize its obligation to take charge of the problem and assume responsibility therefor.

BARTER NOT NECESSARY.

"Reclamation is important, and so is irrigation, and so, I presume, is porosity, but flood protection is imperative. The one class of subjects represents future profit, the other present necessity—the one stands for development, the other for salvation. I do not believe that barter is necessary in order to secure the acquiescence of the Members of the Congress of the United States to the requests of the inhabitants of our stricken valleys for protection against the local culmination of Nation-wide conditions. I do believe that the merit of our cause will secure an adequate, vigorous, and effective response. At any rate, I prefer to take passage on a regular vessel, manned by the regular crew, and bound for a known and designated port, rather than to embark in an excursion whaleback, advertised to sail for some misty El Dorado off somewhere in the unchartered summer seas, and loaded to the guards with enthusiastic prospectors, who will in all likelihood by their own numbers and weight and activity scuttle the ship before it leaves its moorings.

"W. B. THOMPSON.

"MAY 19, 1913."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Members of the House of Representatives be extended to the Speaker, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, for the following statement made in a speech delivered last night to the Woman's National Democratic League, namely, "I know the other 434 Representatives in Congress like a book, and I do not believe there is a single man in the House whose vote can be influenced or changed by the use of money—not one."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say I agree thoroughly with what the Speaker said about the membership of this House, but I do not think this would be a proper resolution and therefore I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor is hereby authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary during the Sixty-third Congress for the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether this committee has had this privilege before?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I am unable to inform the gentleman. I am too new in the situation to do that.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think it would be just as well for the gentleman to withdraw his resolution until he finds out. I think that is a matter that a new chairman ought to find out about.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I understand that is the usual practice, but I submit that there should be no reason for discriminating between the Committee on Labor and the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which this privilege has been granted in the last few minutes.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman may look at it in that way if he pleases. The House heretofore has been in the habit of discriminating; otherwise it would provide by a general rule that all committees shall have this privilege. So long as we have a general rule that does not extend the privilege to all committees, it is not customary to extend it to a committee that has not had it before, unless there is a reason for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate concurrent resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

S. Con. Res. 2. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Joint Committee on Printing to employ a stenographer.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL FRIDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the subject upon which I spoke yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman means, of course, to revise and correct and extend?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MANN. He means to extend, and not to revise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not catch what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] said.

Mr. MURDOCK. I was trying to determine from the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] what his request was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject upon which he spoke yesterday.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, to make it more clear to the gentleman, I will ask leave to revise and extend the remarks I made yesterday.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what does the gentleman mean by "revising" his remarks? I have never been willing to set a precedent in the House of permitting gentlemen making speeches on the floor to eliminate what they have said or to change what they have said. Of course, that is not the intention of the gentleman from Washington. But for a long time objection was made to requests for the revision of remarks. No Member has the right to make a speech on the floor of the House and say one thing and then change it, as sometimes gentlemen are overpersuaded to do when it appears in the RECORD thereafter.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, as I understand the gentleman from Washington, who made quite an extended speech here yesterday, his present request is to extend; that is, add to the speech he made yesterday.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that I am not going to change anything that I said yesterday except to change in a minor way the language and forms of expression, and in cases where a Member interrupted me I shall not make any changes at all.

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Washington that the usual formula here is "to revise and extend."

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is the usual form. Whether it is technically so or not I am not prepared to say.

Mr. MANN. That is not the usual formula. It has been the usual formula at this Congress, and I have objected to it several times. The usual formula heretofore has been to ask for leave "to extend," not "to revise and extend," although certain gentlemen have been in the habit of saying "revise and extend."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want right there to make an inquiry for my own personal information. Has it not been the practice, when we ask leave to extend remarks, to make such modifications as we deem desirable, and also extend? If that is not the proper interpretation, I have been misled in the matter myself.

Mr. MANN. Leave to extend, of course, permits you to add what you please. The leave to extend does not permit a Member who makes an address on the floor of the House to cut it out or to say directly the reverse of what he did say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] will be granted.

There was no objection.

THE FOREST SERVICE.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 45 minutes be allotted to me in which to address the House, either to use as much of the time as I desire or to yield the remainder of the 45 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 45 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 45 minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not want to address the House, does he?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And to yield such time as he does not use to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Kansas is this for the purpose of an intellectual entertainment between the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]? What is the object of it?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut that I for myself do not aspire to the level of an intellectual entertainment; but I do want to make a reply to certain assertions made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] yesterday in a speech here. The gentleman from Connecticut did not object to his request for unanimous consent to address the House.

Mr. DONOVAN. No; I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that there are many things that I have not objected to. I did not object to the proceeding this morning, a most unholy one, and one that would do credit to Joe Cannon. I did not object to that. I do not object to many things that are done here which, if they were done under the cover of darkness, would put people in the penitentiary. [Laughter.] No; I did not object to that, but I say when we have intellectual contests here for hour after hour, with no result except to listen to their eloquence, it is almost the limit. Of what advantage is it to the United States to hear the gentleman from Washington or the gentleman from Kansas, or perhaps the gentleman from Alabama, when he orates on the welfare of the people of his country, and then when he gets behind the closed door of his room he enacts some peculiar conduct of the character of the heathen Chinee. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] made a sensational speech here, in which he criticized the Bureau of Forestry. He went to the extent virtually of advocating the abandonment of the policy of national conservation. Now, before I am through I desire to refute each of the absurd and unfounded charges which he made against the Bureau of Forestry. But before I go into that field, which I shall do with some detail, I want to say this about the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]: I listened with great attention to everything that he said. In my interruptions of him I was actuated solely by a desire to piece out information which I had in part. I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] that the gentleman from Washington has added this to the situation: The gentleman from Washington yesterday advocated openly what the Republican leaders in this House, in my opinion, have nursed secretly for years in regard to this subject. The gentleman from Washington came out in the open and gave us his real thought upon the proposition of conservation, and I believe that the expression he made yesterday is the belief and desire of the men who control the Republican Party here and in the other body.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman will take notice that the leader of the Republican side [Mr. MANN] is not present, and that he is addressing empty benches when he makes that statement.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will take it for granted that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is a leader in the Republican Party.

Mr. GARDNER. Then, let me at once deny your statement.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman denies it, I will accept his denial; but I supposed he was, and I also suppose that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will be able to take care of himself.

Now, to go back to the proposition. When I first came to Congress I saw what I believed then—and believe now—was the beginning of one of the greatest national achievements that we have ever seen—certainly one of the greatest achievements of our generation. I saw Mr. Gifford Pinchot inaugurate a policy which made for a practice of national frugality, so far as our great storehouses of natural wealth are concerned; and, along with that inauguration of a new policy which made for national frugality, I saw Mr. Pinchot, together with Theodore Roosevelt, call a halt on a high carnival of fraud, deception, plunder, and wicked waste in the Nation's resources. I believed then—and I believe now—that in the establishment of a great policy of conservation in this land neither Mr. Pinchot nor Theodore Roosevelt had any appreciable sympathy from the leaders in the Republican Party.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will undoubtedly interrupt me at greater length further on, and I will ask him to let me lay the basis of what I wish to say.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall interrupt the gentleman at all. I do not intend to interrupt him now unless he is perfectly willing that I should ask him just a single question.

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman uses the word "conservation." Is it the gentleman's purpose to define what he means by conservation in order that we may understand what it is that he is discussing?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I intend to deal with the forestry proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. I may not disagree with the gentleman on any proposition that he lays down.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think the gentleman will. I will say to the gentleman that I intend to go into the forestry proposition.

Mr. Speaker, even while the then President of the United States and Mr. Pinchot were inaugurating this new system of conservation in the country there was evidence from time to time that they had little sympathy in the Interior Department and in the General Land Office, where in the beginning a good deal of the policy of conservation in the matter of forest reservations was administered, even though some of the men there were appointed by President Roosevelt himself. A notable appointment of President Roosevelt in those days to the General Land Office was that of Mr. Ballinger. I do not believe that Mr. Ballinger had sympathy with the conservation policy at that time, and I do not think that he is in sympathy with it now.

Later Mr. Ballinger left the Land Office and returned to the practice of law in Seattle, Wash. While he was practicing law in Seattle he took up all manner of land claims. He interested himself, by the way, in the Cunningham claims in Alaska. He made a trip to Ohio to see the then Secretary of the Interior in regard to the Cunningham claims, and talked about jarring the department loose here and forwarding the clear listing of the Cunningham claims. Now, what were the Cunningham claims and how important were they? I know there is a disposition upon the part of a considerable number of Members of this House from the East to believe that there is a very great exaggeration in the West about the necessity of conservation. The statement, for instance, that a prospector traveling through Alaska found 33 locations which he afterwards persuaded friends in the States to father does not seem to be a thing of much magnitude, stated simply; but now I want to outline to the membership of this House precisely what that sort of statement can mean when taken in connection with the great natural resources which we have in the new country. I want to read a statement from the finding of the late Edmund Madison in the Ballinger case, which will explain briefly what the Cunningham claims were in fact, and how far-reaching they were, and how from the discoveries of a chance prospector traveling through the wilds of Alaska there could grow in a very few years a business proposition with a capitalization of $5,000,000 and covering coal deposits of 90,000,000 tons. Here is the statement by Mr. Madison, which illustrates how resources have been exploited in the West:

> The whole line of conduct of the Cunningham claimants from the first indicates a well-understood arrangement to operate their properties in common. Cunningham was the promoter. He was the carrier of glowing accounts of the richness of the fields to his associates, and it is a severe tax on human credulity to believe that he induced any one of the men who associated themselves with him, many of whom were hard-headed business men, to make a claim and invest several thousand dollars in it unless at the time he pointed out to them how the venture would be profitable; and the only way he could do that was to combine them together into an agreement to operate the properties in common by means of a corporation or association.
> A. D. Campbell, Horace Henry, C. J. Smith, and Miles C. Moore, all of whom are Cunningham claimants, are men of affairs, of wealth, and business acumen. They are not the kind of men who would invest thousands in an enterprise at the suggestion of a promoter unless his prospectus showed a feasible plan from start to finish, and one in this case that omitted a community of interest would never pass their inspection. Cunningham has repeatedly admitted in substance that such was his scheme.
> It is a remarkable coincidence that this same hope—the hope of the several persons that an arrangement might be effected after entry for the joint working of the land—sprang at once into the breasts of each one of these claimants, and continued to exist until its culmination in an agreement with the Guggenheims to organize a $5,000,000 corporation in which the Guggenheims should own one-half of the stock.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Ballinger, who had been formerly in the Interior Department under President Roosevelt, was appointed Secretary of the Interior under President Taft, and his subordinates, knowing his desire and his wishes in this matter of the Cunningham claims, pushed the Cunningham claims forward to patent.

Patent, however, was defeated by the protests of a field agent and the whole matter finally came up for investigation by Congress, not only the case of the Cunningham claims, but also other matters. There was investigated besides the matter of Secretary Ballinger's restoring to the public domain certain withdrawals of water-power sites which his predecessor, Mr. Garfield, had made. Mr. Ballinger put those very valuable water-power sites back into the public domain on the ground that Mr. Garfield had no legal right to withdraw them. Thereafter, when criticism became strong against him, Mr. Ballinger rewithdrew the water-power sites. Another matter of investigation by the same commission was the Bureau of Forestry, which the gentleman from Washington yesterday attacked. After the Ballinger investigation, in which the situation as it pertained to Alaska was thoroughly illuminated to the satisfaction of all the people of the United States and to an extent which made Mr. Ballinger's office politically too hot for him to hold, the committee made three reports. The first report was signed by all the Republican members save one, Mr. Madison. Those members were KNUTE NELSON, Frank P. Flint, GEORGE SUTHERLAND, ELIHU ROOT, Samuel W. McCall, Marlin E. Olmsted, and Edwin Denby. Their report was a whitewash. It exonerated Mr. Ballinger. It made no charges against the Bureau of Forestry; it offered nothing at all on Mr. Pinchot personally or officially. The Democratic members of the committee made a report. They found against Mr. Ballinger; they decided that he was not deserving of public confidence and that he should resign. They also found something in regard to the Bureau of Forestry and Mr. Pinchot. Here is their finding:

Third. That Gifford Pinchot and L. W. Glavis were faithful and efficient agents of the Government and the people, devoted to their work, and conscientious in the discharge of their onerous duties and in the rendition of their valuable services; that their protests and actions restrained the officers of the Interior Department and prevented the consummation of a great public wrong; and that their conduct throughout was wholly in the interest of the people.

That was signed by DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, William Purcell, OLLIE M. JAMES, and JAMES M. GRAHAM. A third report was made by Edwin H. Madison, a Republican, and he found against Ballinger and for Mr. Pinchot, Mr. Pinchot having made one of the charges against Mr. Ballinger. I submit that running all the way through this is evidence of the fact that the Republican leadership in Congress, as nearly as you can define it as such, has not been in sympathy with the policy of conservation so far as it pertains to the Bureau of Forestry, and that it was in sympathy with the enemies of conservation. Now, yesterday the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who I think largely voices the present sentiment of the leaders of his party, of whom I think he is justly entitled to be called one——

Mr. BRYAN. Except Mr. GARDNER.

Mr. MURDOCK. I except Mr. GARDNER, of course, at his request. In the resolution which the gentleman from Washington introduced, which, by the way, is much more specific than his speech, he makes inferentially five charges. Let me take up some of the less important ones first, so I may handle the others at greater length. One of his inquiries is as to the reason for the creation and maintenance of a forestry service in Alaska. He said yesterday in his speech that all forest reserves in Alaska should be abandoned. Do I understand the gentleman correctly? I do not want to do him an injustice.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. He said all forest reserves in Alaska should be abandoned. There are twenty-six to twenty-seven million acres of lands in forest reserves in Alaska. In the Bureau of Forestry they say that from 16,000,000 to 17,000,000 acres of that land is forest bearing. If that is true, and they say these forests up there are of commercial value, then I submit they ought not to be abandoned to be privately used for the few, but they ought to be retained by the United States because they are a national asset, and they are of future importance not only to Alaska but to all the Pacific coast.

Now, the gentleman says again, in making his inquiry, that there are in forest reserves many millions of acres of nontimbered land, and asks why many million acres of such land are included in these reserves. Now, not all the areas of forest reserves are timbered, and there are various reasons why a portion of the reserves are not timbered. First of all, all the burned-off areas in forest reserves are nontimbered, and there is a chance there for a restoration and reforestation. There are in all these great reserves, as I understand, small natural parks, located at intervals among these areas. There are, in addition to these, tracts held as protected watersheds, and also considerable tracts of territory above the timber line, and there are, in addition to these, other tracts of nontimbered lands which were taken in by the very early surveys of the exterior boundaries of these reserves.

Gentlemen should remember that at the time the conservation policy was adopted and the lines of these forest reservations were run, this country was up against a riot of marauders who were seizing public lands through the use of dummy entrymen, and it was necessary to act at once, and to act with decision, and in many cases the boundary lines were run around the reservations which took in lands which were not timbered.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me an interruption right there?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly. Go ahead.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I was going to suggest to the gentleman that inasmuch as he insisted yesterday that I ought to name the names of men I referred to, I hope he will give us the names of those gentlemen who were stealing this land.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, if the gentleman will look in the court records out in his country about five or six or seven years ago he will find some of them, I think.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the gentleman is not justified in making his insinuations, and if he makes that insinuation——

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not make any insinuations against the gentleman, but I do say that if the gentleman will investigate the court records of his country he will find that there were indictments and convictions. Does the gentleman deny it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do deny it, and I challenge the gentleman to state them.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will not mention the names. As a matter of fact, the indictments not only reached down into the gentleman's country but some of them got into Congress, and some of them got into other public offices, if I am not mistaken. I have a distinct recollection of reading the evidence in a trial which showed clearly to my mind that records had been burned in public offices right here in Washington. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not keeping the records here, but yesterday the gentleman from Kansas was insistent upon my naming the names, and I did not yesterday in my remarks make any accusation of a criminal character against any gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, as a matter of fact, the gentleman cast all sorts of reflections upon a former President of the United States and exalted to the skies a former Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. Binger Hermann.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In contravention of that remark, if the gentleman will read my speech in the RECORD to-morrow, he will find his accusation is not justified.

Mr. MURDOCK. I hope my remarks are not justified, but the gentleman yesterday made an attack upon the policy of Theodore Roosevelt, and it seemed to me that when the gentleman was handling the Arizona case and the San Francisco Mountain case he reflected upon the President very seriously.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman deny it?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will handle that case unreservedly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman refuses to yield to me time, I can not help it, but yesterday the gentleman took up about one-third of my time when I was making my address and now he declines to be interrupted.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman is at liberty to interrupt me. I will yield to the gentleman if he wants to ask a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will speak in my own time later, if the gentleman declines to be interrupted.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will allow the gentleman to interrupt me, and he can also speak in his own time.

Now, there are many places where nontimbered lands are found in forest reserves. One of the reasons for that is that there were at one time hasty surveys. Since that time reserves have been resurveyed, and a portion of the forest reserve has been released, and that is being done as rapidly as possible. Those nontimbered areas that were placed within the boundaries of the reserves in the first instance are being released.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How many acres of timbered land are contained in the forest reserves in Arizona that were created at the time I referred to, and how many in the California Mountain Reserve and the Grand Canyon Reserve, and in that Santa Barbara case, where they exchanged that tract of 48,000 acres?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman that I suppose I could go to the books which I have here and answer him verbatim et literatim on that proposition, but I do not intend to answer that sort of a question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, if the gentleman will let me go ahead, if that is the manner of his question——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Are there any?

Mr. MURDOCK. Are there any what?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Are there any trees upon those reserves? Is there any merchantable timber upon those reserves?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman's complaint yesterday was that there was an exchange of nontimbered land for timbered land, and there certainly is timbered land on the San Francisco Reserve.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will not.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will not. I will as soon as I get through with the five charges that the gentleman made.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will you let me ask you this——

Mr. MURDOCK. I will not.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then, will you permit me——

Mr. MURDOCK. I will not. I refuse to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman object to being interrupted?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not; but I expect questions that lead somewhere when I submit to an interruption. Now, I decline to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to read to you a sentence from Gifford Pinchot.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask to be protected from the interruptions of the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will you let me read one sentence from Gifford Pinchot?

Mr. MURDOCK. I refuse to yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FERRIS). The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. I refuse to yield to the gentleman; and because he has been so discourteous as to insist on interrupting when I said plainly that I would not be interrupted further I shall not yield to him further.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. All right.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will not yield to the gentleman further.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman refuses to yield, does he?

Mr. MURDOCK. I certainly refuse to yield, Mr. Speaker; and I ask that the gentleman take his seat. Now, the gentleman says——

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MURDOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I want to get through with the five charges made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], and I decline to yield.

Mr. TOWNER. My inquiry is entirely——

Mr. MURDOCK. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. In his resolution the gentleman from Washington further says:

1. That the committee shall inquire into the giving to the Santa Fe Railroad and the Northern Pacific Railroad and other private corporations more than 2,000,000 acres of valuable public land, most of it timbered, in exchange for an equal number of acres of barren, treeless, and practically worthless lands included in forest reserves.

Now, the gentleman yesterday stated somewhat in detail the matter of the San Francisco Mountain Reserve in Arizona. It is true that the Government exchanged for nontimbered lands in that reservation timbered lands elsewhere. I would not commend that trade to-day. I did not commend it then. I do not think anyone would, although there is this view to be taken of it, that naturally we take the temporary view of it to-day. Twenty or thirty years hence the trade and the perfecting of this great forest reservation down there may prove to be for the Nation a very profitable thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for one moment?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will not yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Who will pay the taxes in the State of Washington?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will not yield to the gentleman from Washington. Now, Mr. Speaker, until I conclude dealing with the rest of these charges I ask that I be not interrupted.

That exchange by the Government was made possible by what is known as the lieu-land law. In 1897 Congress passed the lieu-land law. At whose request? I think the best witness upon that proposition is Maj. Lacey, then a Member of Congress from Iowa. He said, on March 3, 1905:

I think I ought to say in this connection that the proposition was originally put into an appropriation bill at the request of homesteaders, men who feared that they would be shut off from schools and injured. The original law was passed at their request.

That law passed Congress. Under it the great special interests in the West began at once to take advantage, to seek to exchange land which they had in forest reserves for better land outside of forest reserves. When the exchange was made in this country it was made on three propositions. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] mentioned two of them yesterday. The third proposition, which he did not mention and which I think is a great deal more blameworthy than the other two that he did mention, is that in regard to extension of timber-cutting leases. In making the exchange the railroads were restricted, first, to a certain area in a given locality as to a certain number of acres, and, second, as to the selection of a certain number of other acres in lieu of lands surrendered they were not restricted. The third proposition carried in the agreement extended the right of the lessees to cut timber, which I do not think the gentleman from Washington commends, and I do not think anyone would if he fully understood it. After this agreement was made, I think the following year, after the trade had been made which the gentleman from Washington complains of, Congress repealed the lieu-land act. If I am correct, the original lieu-land act repeal was introduced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. I think that nearly everyone was in favor of its repeal. I remember that Mr. Pinchot was in favor of the repeal of the lieu-land act, and I think we all were as far as I can recollect.

The repealing act was passed here in the House in April of one year; went to the Senate and remained in the Senate some months, as the gentleman from Wyoming yesterday stated; and then it came back to the House, reaching here in the closing hours of Congress, on the night of March 3, 1905. At that time there was offered an amendment by the conferees. I am going to read the amendment and put it into the RECORD:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the Senate amendment add the following: "Provided, That selections heretofore made in lieu of lands relinquished to the United States may be perfected and patents issue therefor the same as though this act had not been passed, and if for any reason not the fault of the party making the same any pending selection is held invalid another selection for a like quantity of land may be made in lieu thereof." And the Senate agree to the same.

There was some discussion of this proviso, and, as far as I can gather from the RECORD at this day, there was such great confusion that little attention was paid to the item. There was one notable utterance, that made by Mr. De Armond, of Missouri. He said:

It seems there has been ratified an arrangement by which, I think, it will turn out that the railroad companies get great benefits and advantages, as is very nearly always the case.

There was not much debate, and this act repealing the lieu-land law, with this proviso covering transfers, was passed and became the law of the land. Under it these exchanges were apparently closed forever. And yet the gentleman from Washington yesterday, knowing—because I called his attention to it that Congress had done this thing—knowing that after the Secretary had made these arrangements, or at least they had passed under his eye, because there is an absence of formal contracts in the Secretary's record—knowing that Congress still had its opportunity to disapprove or approve or visé this proposition, made his statement blaming the Forestry Bureau. If there is blame to be laid at the door of anyone, it is at the door of Congress and not at the door of the Bureau of Forestry.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will wait until I conclude this paragraph, I will then yield to him, because if I have misstated the situation——

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the gentleman has misstated it.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Washington has made a most serious charge in saying that the Bureau of Forestry was in collusion with the great timber barons, the Weyerhaeuser people and similar great concerns. I have been at some pains to find out what was in that charge. The documents which were open to me are open to him. I found upon perusal of the last report of the Chief Forester—and by the way I do not know him personally and suppose I never have seen him, at least, to identify him—I find in this report statements that answer the gentleman from Washington completely. I find that the Forester has two subheads in the last report, one dealing with the question of agricultural settlements in forest reserves in the West generally, and another subhead dealing with the method the bureau has adopted in disposing of timber. He shows conclusively, to my mind, in his report that under the old plan of plunder of these great timber areas of the West the settler had very little chance, the bona fide farmer.

He shows that it costs the farmer on these timbered tracts an infinite amount of hard labor to clear a small area, at an expense of from $75 to $250 per acre. He points out that usually the beginning of a farm in these timbered countries in the old days was a burned-out patch. He says:

The most conspicuous example of this principle—

That is, the principle of the failure of settlement in privately owned timbered sections in the old days—is found on the Olympic National Forest, concerning which details were given in my report of 1910. Precisely the same result has occurred in other timbered regions, and a careful analysis of all timbered homesteads located in the Kaniksu forest prior to its withdrawal shows that only 1.34 per cent of the cultivable lands has been put to agricultural use; and a similar examination of 71 claims in the Clear Water National Forest of Idaho showed that 1.1 per cent of the claims had been cultivated.

As a matter of fact, under the old system, to which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] proposes to return, and to which I believe this country would return if the impossible could be accomplished and the Republican Party were returned to power, that sort of failure in settlement is what would happen, and yet he stands here and preaches the abandonment of an effective policy of settling up those reserves which are being denuded of their timber.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will yield as soon as I get through with the next paragraph. The gentleman states that the Forestry Bureau is in collusion with the Weyerhaeusers and similar timber and lumber companies. I deny that. I say that the only cooperation between the Bureau of Forestry and these companies is in the very commendable proposition of fighting forest fires, the greatest enemy of timber culture.

I find that the Forester, Mr. Graves, in his last report sets out in great detail—and I am going to ask permission to print his statement in the RECORD at the conclusion of my speech—the method by which they are now cutting timber on Government reserves. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] said yesterday that we were cutting now about 1,000,000,000 feet a year. I find that that was true in the fiscal year of 1912. I find that under the new system which the bureau is perfecting that from July 1, 1912, to May 1, 1913, we have cut 1,819,000,000 feet, doubling the output in one year. The annual loss, as the gentleman correctly stated yesterday, is 5,000,000,000 feet a year. That is the annual growth. I have no doubt that with the perfection of this system we will finally reach that 6,000,000,000 cut, and that we will need it and much more, besides. How are we increasing the cut? I will try to state it correctly, although I realize that I am subject to correction. I quote from the report of the Forester:

Under the policy, in effect until last year, of refusing to dispose of more than approximately 100,000,000 in one sale, or to allow a period for cutting of more than five years, the annual sales of timber have always been less than 1,000,000,000 feet. A large percentage of the mature natural forest is comparatively inaccessible.

I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that 75 per cent is inaccessible. I continue to quote now from the report of the Chief Forester:

And although it occurs in large bodies, heavy investments are required for its removal. In two particular cases this investment was estimated at more than $1,500,000.

Mr. Graves says:

In these large sales a contract period sufficiently long to cut the timber under continuous operation, considering physical factors of the situation and the amount the tributary markets will absorb, is required. When this period exceeds five years a provision is made for a readjustment of the stumpage prices at the end of each three, four, or five year interval. Provision is also made for changes in the contract requirements which will insure utilization.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my time for 35 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Alabama, whom I see rising, will not object to the extension of the time.

The SPEAKER. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to continue for 25 minutes, under the arrangement which was made at the beginning of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to have his time extended for 25 minutes under the agreement made at the beginning.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, inasmuch as the gentleman has refused to yield to me for questions, I couple with that the agreement that I may have 10 minutes' time when he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, make it 35 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BRYAN. On the agreement which was made I was to follow Mr. MURDOCK, and I merely wish to say I am only going to use about five minutes. Under the situation which the debate is in I will not attempt to deliver a speech on the proposition following Mr. MURDOCK.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask for unanimous consent for 25 minutes more, 10 minutes to be used by the gentleman from Washington in conclusion. Is that all right?

The SPEAKER. What about the other gentleman?

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the extension of this time for 25 minutes and I will yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], and when I have concluded, the last 10 minutes to go to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. I did not object to the gentleman from Washington when he wanted an hour the other day, by the way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But the gentleman used most of it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MONDELL. For the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman from Kansas. I understood the gentleman from Kansas desired 25 minutes for himself. The suggestion he now makes would only give him 10 minutes. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly. It gives me 10 minutes and I will get through in that time.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the gentleman from Kansas desires 10 minutes, the gentleman from Washington 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] 10 minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] asks unanimous consent that the time be extended for 25 minutes, 10 minutes of which he is to use, 5 minutes to be used by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], and 10 minutes by Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Graves says further along the same line, in dealing with the matter of selling timber cut from reserves:

Provision is also made for changes in the contract requirements which will insure utilization, methods of logging, and silvicultural practice fully up to the best standards developed in the region at the time of each periodic adjustment of prices. The original stumpage appraisal is based upon a close estimate of the cost of manufacture and the market price of the product. It permits a fair operating profit to the purchaser on his actual investment in the business, but no more. It is, as nearly as the experts of the service can determine, the full market value of the timber where it stands. As a further insurance of full value to the Government in larger sales, the period of advertisement of at least 30 days required by law is increased to from two to six months. The period of advertisement in all cases gives full opportunity to any interested persons to make field examinations of timber. All possible further publicity which will tend to increase interest and competition is sought. The plan of price readjustment most commonly used in the negotiations of the last year was one based upon a comparison of the average mill-run lumber prices during a specified period immediately preceding the date of readjustment with the prices existing at the date of the original appraisal. The forester, in his discretion, may increase the stumpage price by such an amount as he may deem equitable up to 75 per cent of the increase in lumber values. The operator is justly entitled to a portion of the increase in the market value of his product to offset increases in the cost of production and other inherent contingencies.

In sales of large amounts of timber with long cutting periods special precautions are necessary to prevent speculative purchases and the monopoly of timber holdings. The readjustment of stumpage prices largely precludes speculative profits. Other safeguards against speculative purchases are provided by requiring a fixed minimum cut during specified periods which vary from one to five years, but in the larger sales are usually from three to five years; by making sales only to bona fide operators who are financially able to complete them; and by refusing to allow the assignment of contracts. Monopoly is prevented by (1) advertisement and publicity; (2) requiring that railroads and other transportation facilities constructed shall be available under reasonable terms for the use of other purchasers of national forest products, either by becoming common carriers or otherwise; (3) the use of administative discretion in the approval of bids. When any question of monopoly through the possible control of large quantities of timber by affiliated operators arises, a certified statement of the relation of the applicant or bidder to other purchasers of national forest timber may be required. A certified statement of the membership of firms or lists of stockholders in corporations may similarly be required. Lumber companies already holding large amounts of timber on private lands may be refused sales if there are any other purchasers, and companies having one sale may be refused others until the first has been cut. Further safeguards against monopoly are found in that practically without exception the construction of railroads or other transportation facilities in connection with each sale will result in making additional timber available, and that even the largest sales, which may extend through a maximum period of 10 to 20 years, cover but a small fraction of 1 per cent of the merchantable timber on the forests.

Large sales are made only where they furnish the sole means of utilizing inaccessible timber. The experience of seven years has shown that much timber can be disposed of in no other way. The refusal to make such sales would result in great loss of timber, which is already deteriorating. Each sale made under such conditions not only prevents waste, but makes productive an area where now growth is offset by decay. The construction of transportation facilities in connection with every large sale develops and increases the value of other bodies of timber. In a recent case in California the increase in the value of timber not sold was estimated to be considerably more than the purchase price of the timber placed under contract. With the use of a railroad or other improvements granted to subsequent purchasers, the public will secure greater returns from adjacent bodies than it could ever have obtained had the first sale not been made. Finally, every sale of this character opens to general development a region previously locked up; it makes possible new mining operations, aids agricultural development by affording an outlet for crops, creates local business, and draws in population.

The annual yield or amount of timber produced annually upon any area must be the ultimate basis of the cut. It is absolutely necessary that provision be first made on each market unit for meeting local needs. Enough timber for such needs, if it is available, is reserved.

Now, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], in his resolution, made five charges. The first was the matter of exchange of lands under the lieu-land law, a law which was repealed. The second was the complaint that there were in the midst of forest reserves nontimbered areas. There were and there are justifiable reasons for these areas being there. He also makes a third complaint, that no forest reserves in Alaska should be maintained at all. There are in Alaska sixteen to seventeen million acres of land carrying commercial timber and needing governmental protection. The gentleman also makes a fourth complaint, that the Forestry Bureau acts in collusion with the Weyerhaeuser Lumber Syndicate. I think the statement that I have read from the Chief Forester shows that the bureau's arrangement is open and aboveboard. He advertises for bids. He announces how he arrives at this proposition, and he has by that policy induced the building of lines of transportation into the inaccessible points to the extent, he says in one part of his report, that the increase in value of the remaining timber on the reservation was more than the purchase price of that which had been sold from it by reason of the construction of transportation facilities. And finally the gentleman makes a fifth charge, that from four to five billion feet of lumber are being permitted annually to decay in these great reservations, and he blames the Bureau of Forestry for this; for not getting this lumber out of the inaccessible places to market.

Now, the facts are these, that the Bureau of Forestry is working out a system, which I have explained in detail, which will eventually utilize the total annual yield of those forests. It will not do it, however, so long as the national forests are inaccessible, or any considerable portion of them.

These are the charges, then, that the gentleman brings against the Bureau of Forestry. They would not be of moment if the gentleman did not couple with his resolution the assertion—made as one of the Republican Members of this body, and speaking for a considerable part of the membership of this body, and representing really, as I believe, the sentiments of the leaders of the Republican Party—that the policy of national conservation should be abandoned. It would not matter so much, I say, if the gentleman made the charge, if he did not couple with it the proposition virtually to abandon the policy of national conservation. We had the old system. It was a system of fraud, a system of cheat, a system of plunder and of waste everywhere. We have now a new system. It proposes to save to this Nation a great storehouse of national wealth. It would be a calamity not only for the present but for the future to abandon a policy of such moment and such necessity and such worth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time, less the last 10 minutes, to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], addressed the House yesterday from a resolution which he stated he was going to introduce calling for an investigation of the Forest Service in the particulars set forth in the resolution.

I stated that the Congressman addressed the House from this resolution. He did not speak on the resolution or to the resolution. Although the resolution calls for an investigation of the Forest Service and the character, competency, and conduct of those employed therein, still the gentleman in his discussion did not press a solitary reason why his resolution should be adopted.

I thought the gentleman showed every courtesy to the Members of the House in his debate, and it is my desire to say nothing personal in the course of my remarks. I can not, however, fail to refer to the fact that a few days ago, after I had spoken in the House, my colleague made the following comment upon me:

> Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, first I want to congratulate my new colleague from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] that in his first speech, fresh from the people, newly baptized in righteousness, with the words "Onward, Christian Soldiers" still upon his lips, he classifies himself as one of those speckled and spotted protectionists who wants protection for himself and free trade for everybody else.

Perhaps there are some who will recognize an old saying, somewhat paraphrased, when I quote "Cast thy bread upon the waters and it will return again unto thee after many days"—buttered. So I take the liberty of commenting on my colleague's public record as bearing upon the remarks he made to the House yesterday.

When it comes to any great issue, wherein the great mass of the people are fundamentally interested as against some great powerful interest, my colleague has a record which is neither "speckled" nor "spotted." It is a uniform, never failing allegiance to the interest of men of great wealth, and those who during the decades past, through the men who were the leaders of the Republican Party, obtained so many privileges for the few against the interest of the people.

Those who heard his bitter arraignment of conservation and his emphatic declaration for the immediate disposal of the country's remaining timber holdings yesterday would be surprised, in view of the fact that this conservation movement of the Forest Service has the special indorsement and backing of certain men, to know that my colleague on the stump in the State of Washington about two years ago made the following statement:

> I believe in that most versatile and popular man that the world has ever known—Theodore Roosevelt.
> [Laughter.]
> I believe in his policies; they are the policies of the people; they are the policies of the country; they are the policies of the Republican Party; they are the policies from which the Republican Party will never depart.
> [Laughter and applause.]

He did not then denounce conservation; he did not then proclaim against the well-known policy of Theodore Roosevelt to conserve the remaining forests isolated and removed from commerce and transportation.

Then the gentleman from Washington said that this policy of Theodore Roosevelt was one of the policies of the Republican Party from which that party would never depart, or at least he did not except it from his proud reference to the Roosevelt policies.

The gentleman from Washington, my colleague, according to the record in the office of the Conservation Association, has a distinct anticonservation record. On April 2, 1907, in the Fifty-ninth Congress, on the second Appalachian bill he voted "nay," unfriendly to conservation; in the Sixtieth Congress, on January 19, 1909, he voted "nay" on the Weeks bill, unfriendly; in the Sixty-second Congress, on August 22, 1912, he voted unfriendly on amendment to the Coosa Dam bill and on the bill itself.

The debates in Congress show him making comments unfriendly to conservation in the Sixtieth Congress on March 1, 1909, while the Appalachian bill was under discussion; in the Sixty-first Congress, on January 5, 1910, while the Ballinger resolution was under discussion; in the Sixty-second Congress, on June 16, 1911; and in the Sixty-second Congress, on April 15, 1912.

The record also shows that my colleague, the gentleman from Washington, led the anticonservation forces in the pro-Ballinger-anti-Pinchot fight on the floor of this House.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield right there for just one question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. BRYAN. I think I have but one minute remaining, but I will give it to my colleague.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask but one question, and that is, Who made the notation "unfriendly" in the statement which the gentleman is reading?

Mr. BRYAN. It was made under the guidance of that leading conservationist, Gifford Pinchot, in his office.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is what I wanted to ascertain.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, too, it was the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] who introduced in this Congress a resolution to investigate the Department of Forestry once before. This investigation was alleged at the time to have been suggested by him in order to becloud the issue. The comparison was suggested of the cuttlefish—not directly referring to the gentleman from Washington—but it was said that the purpose of this investigation of the "pernicious activity" of Gifford Pinchot was to defend Secretary Ballinger.

The Congressman was accused of endeavoring to protect his friend, Secretary Ballinger. Many charges of improper conduct of the Department of the Interior were pending against Secretary Ballinger. And Gifford Pinchot was engaged in an earnest and determined effort to safeguard the country's coal deposits in Alaska from entry by the Cunningham claimants. He was successful, and the country owes to him a debt of gratitude.

It was claimed in the debate on this former resolution that the Congressman from Washington by his resolution to investigate the Forestry Service, in the Agriculture Department, was endeavoring to play the cuttlefish in the waters which surrounded the Interior Department in order to protect his friend, Secretary Ballinger.

It was pointed out then, as now, that there were no charges against the individuals in the Forestry Service. Gifford Pinchot had been accused only of "pernicious activity." In the debate Congressman HUMPHREY of Washington disclaimed any intention to discredit anybody, but acknowledged a desire to defend Secretary Ballinger.

Are we not safe in the conclusion that the gentleman from Washington does not really desire an investigation now, but that the old controversy is still ringing in his ears and by force of habit he is reverting to a plan to vindicate his friend and to make good with those leaders in the State of Washington who have his political destiny in the hollow of their hands?

In his speech here, however, on time at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], he establishes a Republican policy.

The resolution seeks information concerning lieu-land selections. All agree with the gentleman from Washington that through these lieu-land selections the public was robbed of a princely domain. This was made possible under act of June 4, 1897, which contained the little joker that did the work for the railroads and the big timberland owners. The forest reservations were then administered under the Department of the Interior.

The rank injustice of these lieu-land selections and innumerable other land frauds in the Department of the Interior raised a determined cry for reform and the preservation of the forests. And the jurisdiction was transferred to the Agriculture Department on March 3, 1905.

The absurdity of an investigation of the present Bureau of Forestry in order to obtain information concerning these frauds is apparent, in view of the fact that all of the selections complained of were made while the Forestry Service was being administered in the Department of the Interior, and the whole matter has been fully investigated and fully reported on by the Bureau of Corporations, Luther Conant, jr., commissioner. This full and able report is dated January 20, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend in the RECORD my remarks, and I also ask unanimous consent to make a correction in an interruption that I made in the speech of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] yesterday, wherein I mixed the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that portion of the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SHOULD THE FOREST RESERVES BE ABANDONED?

Mr. BRYAN. It seems to be the contention of the gentleman that the Forest Service should be abandoned; that the timber holdings of the country should be surrendered at whatever price can be obtained for them under the old system which prevailed a decade or so ago. All will agree with him when he says that the Government was fleeced out of valuable timber holdings under lieu-land selections. It is worthy of comment, however, that the Republican Party, then in power, took no steps to stop these iniquities.

Under control of the Republican leaders and at the instance of the men in the timber sections of the country who were in control of the Republican Party, who officered the conventions, who made the nominations for public office, to whom the precinct committeemen and the members of the organization looked for instructions under this leadership millions of acres of timberlands as well as other lands of almost inestimable value were taken from the Government fraudulently, by false affidavits, by congressional aid, and by every device that ingenuity could invent.

STATE CONTROL IS URGED.

It is urged by the anticonservationists that the States should control these forest lands. Yet the record shows that under State control the most flagrant frauds were perpetrated. Liberality, or else collusion, on the part of State officers has permitted lands to pass into the hands of large owners of timber with astounding rapidity and in very large areas. In 1900 and 1901, 705,000 acres were eliminated from the Olympic National Forest on the ground that the land was chiefly valuable for agriculture, and that the forest reserve was retarding the settlement of the country. Of this large area 523,720 acres passed into the hands of owners who are now holding it purely as a timber speculation. Three companies and two individuals own over 178,000 acres in holdings of from 15,000 to over 80,000 acres. The report of the United States Forester for 1910 further shows:

Of timbered homestead claims on this eliminated area, held by 100 settlers, the total area under actual cultivation is 570 acres, an average of 5.7 acres to each claim. It will be seen that the original purpose of the elimination was defeated and that bona fide settlement was not materially advanced.

The following is taken from the report of the Department of Commerce and Labor on the lumber industry, issued January 1, 1913, and is added proof that timberland, if not held by the Government, will be rapidly absorbed by the big timber operators:

Eastern Washington: One informant did not value the timber of Stevens County, which occupies the northeastern corner of Washington, at more than 75 cents a thousand. Others said that Stevens County timber could have been bought 10 years before for 25 cents a thousand, but would now cost from 50 cents to $3, according to accessibility. Speculators have been picking up timber in that region at about $1 a thousand. One exceptionally fine tract of white pine in Stevens County, 2,560 acres, estimated at 30,000,000 feet, was sold in 1908 for $75,000, or $2.50 per thousand on the estimate. The comparatively high price was due partly to the quality and the situation of the timber and partly to the size of the holding, which gave it some importance. In Ferry County, next west of Stevens, one small company bought 20,367,000 feet of pine in 1906 at a total cost of $20,272, or practically $1 a thousand. The land went with the timber, and so did a considerable quantity of larch and fir, which was not considered in reckoning the price. All was in 160-acre claims, except one purchase of 320 acres. Nearly all was bought at $1 a thousand on the estimate; probably equivalent to 60 or 70 cents a thousand, for the pine only, on the scale of the logs. In Stevens County the same company made purchases of small lots, from 1905 to 1908, amounting in the aggregate to about 100,000,000 feet, at prices ranging from about $1 to about $2 a thousand on the estimates.

The greater part of this timber is western pine. There are smaller quantities of larch and fir, a little white pine, and a little miscellaneous timber.

A tract of 60,000 acres in Stevens County was bought from the Northern Pacific Railway Co., in 1901, for $127,500, and was sold in October, 1906, for $500,000. The original purchasers estimated the timber at 310,000,000 feet. This was said to be double the Northern Pacific cruise, but was far below the estimate of the later owners. On this estimate the price of 1901 was 41 cents a thousand, and that of 1906 was $1.61—nearly four times as much.

On the whole, the market value of any given tract of timber in western Montana, Idaho, or eastern Washington, taken at random, is perhaps likely to be four or six times as great in 1911 as it was in 1900; but those who gathered considerable holdings about 1900, by picking up small tracts at the prices then current for small tracts, might now, in some cases, sell for 10 or 15 times what they paid.

Western Washington: So recently as the years 1902–1904 timber operators were still absorbing large quantities of timber in Washington which till then was owned by the United States. Under the timber and stone act alone nearly 600,000 acres in the State were taken during those three years. Men used to take up 160-acre claims, and pay the Government $2.50 an acre, or $400 per claim. Some purchasers got 10,000,000 feet or more; and in such cases the cost was 4 cents per thousand feet or less. Most of the claimants sold their lands to speculators at from $600 to $1,500 per claim. For instance, in 1891 a speculator bought 160 acres in King County for $800. He estimated that it contained between seven and nine million feet, of which half was cedar. He held it till 1909, and sold it for $18,500. So late as the years from 1903 to 1907 a tract of 8,000 acres in Clallam County, west of Puget Sound, was picked up from claimants at an average cost of about $1,220 per 160-acre claim, or a total cost not far from $61,000. The timber was estimated in 1907 at 472,000,000 feet. The cost to the speculator, on this estimate, was a fraction under 13 cents a thousand. The tract was sold, in June, 1907, for $200,000, and soon after the speculator had closed this bargain he received an offer of $280,000. The price he sold at was 42 cents a thousand on the estimate; the price afterwards offered was 59 cents.

In general, the less accessible timber has sold in recent years at from 50 cents to $1 a thousand, but most of the tracts which go at such prices are small. What gets into the hands of the larger owners is likely to stay there till it commands more. One company bought a holding of 100,000,000 feet, 25 or 30 miles southeast of Tacoma, in 1907 at $1 a thousand, and about the same time picked up 18,000,000 feet in small lots at an average cost of 81 cents. The Milwaukee Land Co., which made very extensive purchases of inaccessible timber about the same time, buying almost exclusively from small owners, is understood to have paid an average price of about 80 cents. Mr. George S. Long, manager of the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., stated in a public hearing before the Pierce County board of equalization, in August, 1908, that the Milwaukee company had "purchased in 1906 and up to September, 1907, 6,000,000,000 feet at less than 80 cents."

The land-grabbers know that they can strike a better bargain, as a rule, under State management than under Federal control. The tax argument is persistently urged on behalf of State and individual ownership. This means, of course, that if the State had control it would soon pass the timber land into private hands, and that the revenues of taxation would be greatly increased. It appears absurd to give away property in order to get the taxes. If the property were not worth more than the taxes, these timber operators would not want it. The taxes do not amount to so much in any case, and after the timber is cut away the tax is only nominal.

Moreover, the taxable value of forests in remote, uninhabited regions or summits of mountain ranges would be very problematical, and, in our opinion, elimanating the undesirability of turning the forests over to private ownership, the perpetual income the State will eventually receive from sales of stumpage would far exceed any amount that could probably be received from taxes.

HILL AND WEYERHAEUSERS OPPOSED TO FOREST RESERVES.

At the National Conservation Congress, September 6, 1910, James J. Hill was the most enthusiastic advocate of State control of these lands. He was entirely opposed to the position of the conservationists and the Forest Service in the matter. Every large timber operator or owner is opposed to the plan of the Forest Service in its policy of handling the timber belonging to the Government as a Government utility and as a reserve for future generations, as well as for every practical use of the present.

Yet my colleague asserts that James J. Hill, the Weyerhaeusers, and the big operators generally, approve of the forest reserves as they are managed by the Government. This statement is not borne out by the facts. Nothing could please the big timber owners half so well as to get possession of this timber that now belongs to the Government. There could be no doubt that if they owned this timber the value of their entire holdings would at once greatly enhance. Such transfers would strengthen them and give them absolute control of the lumber industry until the timber of the country becomes exhausted. Surely no one can be silly enough to suggest that such transfers would cause the big operators to lower the price of lumber to the consumer.

At the second National Conservation Convention above referred to, William Douglas Johns made a speech, a part of which I shall insert in my remarks as indicating the nature of the controversy that was going on between the varying interests at that convention:

I wish to tell the delegates here, for the purpose of showing the necessity of Federal control, how the water-power sites of the State of Washington—the greatest of them—have passed from the hands of the State within a few months, under the administration of Land Commissioner Ross, who has made himself so prominent here this evening. Two corporations have filed on the low waters of the mighty Columbia—a railroad and water corporation, with steamboats plying 100 miles above and carrying freight and passengers, and an irrigation corporation below, using half of the waters of the Columbia River—and all the State of Washington got was filing fees; and Gov. Hay wants us to give the balance to him in the same way—the other half of those great waters of the mighty Columbia. The lands secured by the railroad corporation within a few months on the shore—lands worth millions of dollars—were sold by Gov. Hay and Land Commissioner Ross for $10,000, and Gov. Hay wants us to turn over more to him for the same purpose. The waters of Chelan River in the Cascades James J. Hill secured—125,000 horsepower—by paying filing fees to the State. No wonder in his speech he favored State control!

PINCHOT DID NOT APPROVE FRAUD AT SANTA BARBARA.

Reference was made in the speech of my colleague, the gentleman from Washington, to the Santa Barbara lieu-land selection, and it was asserted that Mr. Gifford Pinchot had indorsed this transaction whereby the Santa Fe Railroad had gained an advantage and had really defrauded the Government. In proof of the injustice of this charge I here insert the letter written by Mr. Pinchot. This letter will certainly disprove the statement made. It will be noticed that Mr. Pinchot stated in the letter that he was informed that "untimbered lands in one of the Dakotas" were to be substituted for the lands the Government were giving up. The letter is as follows:

THE FORESTER, BUREAU OF FORESTRY, TO W. A. RICHARDS, SEPTEMBER 3, 1903.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., September 3, 1903.

Hon. W. A. RICHARDS,
General Land Office, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I have just had a look at the water problem of Santa Barbara, and I want to send you a word about the situation there and the necessity for the acquisition by the Government of the Rancho Prieta y los Najalehos, if that is the way to spell it. It seems perfectly evident from what I was able to learn that the city of Santa Barbara will be very seriously deficient in water supply within two or three years unless the acquisition of this area by the Government makes it possible for the city to acquire a new source from the headwaters of the Santa Ynez River. Santa Barbara is now drawing upon the water stored in the Santa Ynez Range along the line of a tunnel which the city is pushing into the mountains. Sources of ground water of this character are not permanent, and it becomes extremely desirable for the city to own a safe supply.

You will remember that the difficulty in the case has arisen from the lieu-land question. I am informed that Mr. Washburn has agreed to take untimbered land in one of the Dakotas for his holdings back of Santa Barbara. From the condition of the water supply, I am strongly of the opinion that even at the cost of a relatively poor bargain by the Government, which from the present situation I apprehend is not to be feared, it would be wise to make the exchange. Water is practically the sole output of the forest reserves in this region, and it appears to me that this action on the part of the United States is precisely in line with the policy which has dictated the setting aside of all the reserves in this region.

I expect to be in Meeteetsee for a meeting of cattle and sheep men on September 23, but I shall miss seeing you on your way in for your hunting trip, as I hoped to do. I was sorry not to see Barrett, too, who, I understand, has been doing capital work.

I want to send you my best wishes for the complete recovery of Mrs. Richards and my hope of seeing you again before long.

Very sincerely, yours,

GIFFORD PINCHOT, Forester.

ROOSEVELT AND PINCHOT STOPPED THE FRAUD.

There came a time when these fraudulent transactions had to stop. Theodore Roosevelt was elected President in November, 1904, and his own selected Cabinet took office in March, 1905. Public sentiment was aroused, and the people were determined to stop the waste that was going on and to prevent further consolidation of timberlands into the hands of a few.

On March 7, 1904, the public-land commission, consisting of W. A. Richards, T. H. Newell, and Gifford Pinchot, made the following report and recommendations:

Careful study has been given by your commission to the subject of forest-reserve lieu-land selections. These selections have given rise to great scandal and have led to the acquisition by speculators of much valuable timber and agricultural land and its consolidation into large holdings. Furthermore, the money loss to the Government and the people from the selection of valuable lands in lieu of worthless areas has been very great. There has been no commensurate return in the way of increased settlement and business activity. Public opinion concerning lieu-land selections, by railroads in particular, has reached an acute stage. The situation is in urgent need of a remedy, and your commission recommends the repeal of the laws providing for lieu-land selections.

A partial remedy by Executive action has already been applied by carefully locating the boundaries of new forest reserves, and thus limiting lieu-land selections to comparatively insignificant areas. The last annual message to Congress declares definitely that—

"The making of forest reserves within railroad and wagon road land-grant limits will hereafter, as for the past three years, be so managed as to prevent the issue, under the act of June 4, 1897, of base for exchange or lieu selection (usually called scrip). In all cases where forest reserves within areas covered by land grants appear to be essential to the prosperity of settlers, miners, or others the Government lands within such proposed forest reserves will, as in the recent past, be withdrawn from sale or entry pending the completion of such negotiations with the owners of the land grants as will prevent the creation of so-called scrip.

"There are now lands in private ownership within existing forest reserves, and similar lands must to a limited extent be included in new reserves. Therefore a method is required by which the Government may obtain control of nonagricultural holdings within the boundaries of these reserves. Your commission recommends the following flexible plan: Upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, when the public interest so demands, the Secretary of the Interior should be authorized, in his discretion, to accept the relinquishment to the United States of any tract of land within a forest reserve covered by an unperfected bona fide claim lawfully initiated or by a patent, and to grant to the owner in lieu thereof a tract of unappropriated, vacant, surveyed, nonmineral public land in the same State or Territory and of approximately equal area and value as determined by an examination, report, and specific description by public surveys of both tracts, to be made on the ground by officials of the Government. When exchange under these conditions can not be effected, lands privately owned within forest reserves should be paid for in cases where the public interest requires that such lands should pass into public ownership. The Secretary of the Interior should be authorized to take the necessary proceedings as rapidly as the necessary funds are provided."

Further lieu-land selections were prohibited by an administration bill on March 3, 1905.

THE TIMBER MUST BE HELD AND OPERATED AS A PUBLIC UTILITY.

The people have seen their money spent for roads, for rivers and harbors, for public buildings, for the Panama Canal, for expositions, and for innumerable enterprises which have brought to them only indirect returns. The Government machinery has seemed to serve them directly and commercially only in the matter of the handling of the mail through the Post Office Department. In every case where there was any return or profit in evidence it has been the policy to pass the enterprise up to private ownership and private operation.

It has been claimed that for the Government to operate their timber lands tends toward socialism and encourages Government ownership of utilities. If it is socialistic for the Government to own and operate its timber, then we are confronted with a form of socialism in which I believe the entire country accords. If it is necessary to sell more of the timber than can be sold wholesale in order to prevent waste, and it becomes impossible for the Forest Service to induce private capital to come upon the forest reserves and buy the timber and manufacture it into lumber, then we may find ourselves in a position where it will be necessary for the Government to cut the lumber for the uses of the Government—and for private consumption, for that matter.

The following statement given out by the Forest Service will be of great interest in this connection, and I take advantage of the opportunity of inserting it in my remarks:

SELLING NATIONAL FOREST TIMBER.

The crucial test of public ownership and management of forests in the United States will be the power to resist an unintelligent demand for the Government to sell timber cheap, on the supposition that this will enable the public to buy lumber cheap.

WOULD IT PAY?

The Government is now being criticized for not selling national forest timber cheaper and faster. It is charged with virtually aiding private timber monopolies to gouge the public. In point of fact it is doing just the reverse.

The Government could not materially lower the cost of lumber to the average consumer if it were to reduce by half the price charged for timber cut on the national forests. But it could enable many lumbermen to grow rich fast. Also, it could and would prepare the way for a timber monopoly later that would be a monopoly with a vengeance. Incidentally it would promote wanton and great waste of valuable timber, both on and off the national forests, by operators who would merely skim the cream, and it would permit the extra cost of bad management to be saddled on the public.

HOW TIMBER IS SOLD.

The average price at which national forest timber was sold on the stump by the Government last year was $2 per thousand.

The Forest Service spent thousands of dollars advertising its timber. It seeks purchasers by every means in its power. It sold during the last fiscal year the equivalent of about 800,000,000 board feet of timber in all forms—for lumber, mine props, fuel, posts, and many other uses.

The cut for lumber alone of the entire United States was between 40,000,000,000 and 45,000,000,000 feet.

All sales of over $100 worth of timber were made after advertisement for competitive bids. The Forest Service is prohibited by law from selling in any other way. It is also prohibited by law from selling or offering for sale any timber until after it has been appraised, or for less than the appraised value.

To permit of timber being sold for less than its market value the law would have to be changed.

Should it be changed?

THE CONSUMER PAYS THE MARKET PRICE.

Who would have benefited if the timber actually paid for last year had been sold at half the market price or given away?

Would the general market price have been less to the purchaser from the retail dealer? Not one cent. The manufacturers who cut this insignificant fraction of the country's total lumber cut would have sold their lumber at the market price, pocketing the $1 or $2 or $3 per thousand less than the market price of stumpage with which the Government had presented them. But if they had sold to the wholesaler for less, would he have handed the present on to the retailer? And if the retailer had got any part of it, would he have given it to the consumer?

To enable the consumer to benefit by a stumpage price less than purchasers of stumpage stand ready to pay, the Government would have to manufacture, transport, and market the lumber, selling directly to the consumer from its own retail lumber yards.

TO MATERIALLY LOWER THE RETAIL PRICE BY INCREASING THE CUT THE GOVERNMENT WOULD HAVE TO OVERCUT ITS FORESTS.

But suppose the Government had by giving timber away to all applicants raised the national forest cut to one-fifth of the entire cut of the country.

In point of fact, it could not have done this by giving the timber away. It would have had to pay lumbermen to come and get it. With lumber prices where they are now the Government can get from 50 cents to $5 per thousand for its stumpage under competitive bids, the price depending on the location and kind of timber sold. Ten years ago it could not have given away what it is selling to-day; not, that is, as stumpage. It could easily have given the timber to speculators to hold for rising prices.

The present national-forest stand forms one-fifth of the country's total supply of saw timber. If one-fifth of the annual lumber cut were drawn from the forests and at the same time they continued to supply the timber in other forms demanded by western mining, agriculture, and other industries, the forests would be cut off faster than the country's total supply.

The country's total supply is being cut three times as fast as it grows.

If the Government gave timber away and the consumer got the full benefit the $2 per thousand gain to him would be but a trifling part of the retail price. It would not restore the cheap lumber prices of a few years ago.

SALES OF GOVERNMENT TIMBER FOR LESS THAN ITS MARKET VALUE WOULD DIRECTLY PROMOTE MONOPOLISTIC CONTROL OF TIMBER SUPPLIES.

Years before the national forests were set aside speculators were busy securing the best timberlands of the public domain. Twice as much western timber is in private as in public ownership.

At any given price level there is a certain amount of timber that will pay the cost of cutting. The rest is not on the market, because to cut and manufacture it would cost more than it would sell for.

Privately owned timber involves carrying charges to the owners, interest on capital tied up, taxes, and cost of protection or fire risk. Private owners are, therefore, under pressure to sell and extinguish these charges. They also have, as a rule, the timber that would naturally be first to come into demand. They saw to that when they got it.

But, at a given price level, there is always a limit to the amount of timber that is on the market. The owner will not go beyond a certain point. When that point is reached he prefers to hold, not manufacture, his timber.

After lumber prices fell in 1907 many lumber mills operated at a loss rather than shut down altogether. The owners had miscalculated the demand, but having set up their mills could not shut down altogether without incurring greater losses than those involved in running. The output in 1912 in the West was only about 60 per cent of the capacity of the mills.

This is what the lumber trade knows as "overproduction."

The consumer thinks there is not production enough, because lumber costs him more than it did 10 years ago. But the forests that supplied him 10 years ago are gone. Though there is still plenty of timber left, it is less accessible and more expensive to get on the market.

If the Government cuts its stumpage price in half, more mills will be located on the forests but fewer will operate outside. The cut from Government land will take the place of part of the cut from private holdings. In effect, the Government would pay a bounty to induce operators to cut its trees instead of their own.

Part of this bounty would be a pure gift to the operators. Men who find it to their advantage to buy national forest timber at the present prices would make more money. To the extent that the cut from Government land took the place of the cut from private holdings the bounty would represent the cost of bringing about this substitution. It would be the inducement held out to secure the reversal of the order dictated by business conditions.

This would inevitably accentuate the condition known to the lumber trade as "overproduction."

Those operators who are now breaking even or running at a loss or with curtailed output would, of course, if they could, withdraw from the market and let the cut from Government lands take the place of the cut from their holdings.

If they could all do this, the consumer would not be benefited at all. But not all could. They have incurred business obligations which they must meet. The weak ones would be shaken out. The value of stumpage would decline. The strong ones would seize the opportunity to add to their holdings. The field for speculative buying of timberlands would be wide open again.

Gradually a condition of equilibrium would be restored. The surplus of stumpage artificially created would be absorbed, partly by cutting, partly by speculative acquisition and withdrawal. Private timber would be concentrated in fewer hands. Public timber would have diminished. The chance for monopoly profits and artificial control of the market would have been made materially greater. Then the consumer would pay the score—with usury.

POLICY OF FOREST SERVICE.

The Forest Service is selling timber as fast as this can be done without sacrificing the interests of the public. It is making every effort consistent with sound business to dispose of the overripe stumpage on the forests and bring the annual cut up to a fair portion of the yield. It is advertising commercial opportunities on the forests widely and successfully. Its sale contracts are framed to meet practical business and logging conditions. They are accepted by business men and are attracting large investment. The small manufacturer is sought wherever he is equipped to utilize the timber. But where the capital and organization of the big operator are needed to develop inaccessible areas large sales are made. Yet in all contracts holding timber for speculation is prohibited and the payment of the proper value is assured by frequent adjustments of price.

This policy is succeeding. The use of national forest timber on a sound and stable basis is increasing rapidly. Since July 1, 1912, over one and one-half billion feet has been sold. Many operators are looking to the forests for new locations. If the demand is sustained, the yearly sales will soon reach 3,000,000,000 feet. The annual growth on a number of forests which are within reach of markets is now fully used. As transportation facilities are extended this will be brought about on every forest.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] also asks unanimous consent to make a correction concerning the names of the departments, in an interlocutory performance that he had with the other gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, personally I have no objection, but I think it is due to the House to make a statement in regard to that, since he has referred to it. I reserve the right to object, in order to make this statement in regard to the matter. The colloquy occurred yesterday in regard to the transfer of the Forest Service from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture. My colleague [Mr. BRYAN] had the matter exactly wrong. There was some colloquy took place. It was not of very great importance, but there was another matter also in connection with the speech yesterday that we were talking about changing. I was willing to strike it all out, but I submitted the question to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] this morning, and he objected. Now it is a matter for the House to decide whether we change the record of things that are actually spoken here on the floor or not. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] insists on his portion of it being kept in, I shall insist that the whole record go in.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] will remember that my interruption of him was quite foreign to the interruption of his colleague [Mr. BRYAN], and I could not see why my interruption was affected at all by any change in the remarks of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say that the gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair inquire, What is this correction that the gentleman wants to make?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I suggested that this Forestry Service had been transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior. I should have said just exactly the reverse. That is what I want to correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why not let it go?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, if the gentleman objects; but I should like to have him object before the whole House.

The SPEAKER. Has the matter been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BRYAN. No; the gentleman has withheld it, and he has the speech on his desk.

The SPEAKER. It has not been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BRYAN. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to revise his remarks without asking the consent of anybody, provided he does not change his remarks in such a way as to put the gentleman in a ridiculous attitude in his own remarks, based on what the other gentleman said.

Mr. BRYAN. My remarks were commented upon by the gentleman. He made a statement correcting my remarks, and if I were now to correct the manuscript of my remarks by changing what I actually said, the gentleman would have to remove his correction. For that reason I do not consider that I have the right to do it without his consent.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why not let it stand?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to change a dialogue without the consent of the other gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The reason for that is illustrated by an instance which I will state. Mr. Speaker Reed harnessed me up once on the objection of another Member. I was making a speech and was getting to the end of it. I was in the midst of the last sentence, which happened to be a very long one. It was a carefully prepared speech, and I thought it was a very fine sentence. A gentleman bobbed up right in the middle of that sentence and asked me a question that was utterly irrelevant to what I was talking about. I answered his question and then went back to the beginning of my sentence and repeated the whole of it, and when I received the reporter's notes of my speech I struck out that question and my answer to it. I thought I had a right to do that. Well, the next morning the Member came in and rose to a question of privilege, to know why I had stricken out this important question that he had asked.

Speaker Reed, who was very kind toward me always, said that I was wrong about it; that in a dialogue when anybody interrupted a Member who had the floor he had the right to decline to be interrupted, and he had the right to strike out the question if he refused to be interrupted; but that if he answered the question, as I had done, he had no right to strike out the question and answer without the consent of the other Member. And, when you come to study about it, that was a very correct ruling, because there is a reason for everything. In this dialogue the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] made certain statements which the other gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] commented upon. Then, if the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] strikes out that statement, or modifies it—I do not know what the effect would be in this particular case, but it might put the other gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] in a very awkward and preposterous attitude as making remarks that did not seem pertinent at all. Therefore, under the rule, a dialogue can not be modified without the consent of both parties.

Mr. MURDOCK. In regard to the matter of the RECORD and the elimination of remarks, it has been my custom to let the RECORD stand, simply correcting the bad grammar; but I would like to ask the Speaker what his ruling would be in this sort of a case? A few moments before the Speaker came into the Chamber I repeatedly refused to yield, and yet all the time I was subjected to a storm of interruptions. Now, do those interruptions go out or simply be left in the RECORD? My inclination is to leave them in.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Kansas declines to yield he has a right, when he comes to revise his remarks, to strike out the question or interruption, whatever it was. But if he answers, then he is not permitted to change the dialogue without the consent of the interlocutor.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have always believed that the better practice was to allow the RECORD to show precisely what took place, barring bad grammar.

The SPEAKER. There is no ruling that the Chair is called upon to make in this instance.

Mr. BRYAN. I have asked unanimous consent that I may make the change, but if my colleague does not wish to change it I am content.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] consents that his interruption may be changed, I shall object.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the matter of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has nothing to do with my interruptions. They are several pages apart.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to call the Speaker's attention to this fact, that when I rose and asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] pointed out at that time that he should object to a change of anything that had occurred on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington objects. Now, while this matter of parliamentary practice is up, the Chair would like to make a suggestion, and that is that the Chair is not called upon to recognize anybody who says anything in his seat without rising. There is good reason for that, as I explained once before. There is so much talk going on here, some people talking as loud in private conversation as they do on the floor, that the Speaker can not possibly be looking everywhere at one time. This morning a Member called for the regular order, but the Member did not get up out of his seat and the Chair could not tell who it was that called for it.

All these rules are made to preserve order. This rule is violated by some of the most prominent men in the House and by some of the oldest Members. When a Member has the floor and some one wants to interrupt, the proper way is to rise and address the Chair, not because the Chair wants to be addressed, but it serves to preserve order; it keeps down quarrels and it prevents fights. So these rules which seem immaterial sometimes are exceedingly important.

The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, my apology for detaining the House for a few minutes is because the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], although he absorbed a good deal of my time yesterday, apparently did not care to yield to me to-day. The only thing of which the gentleman complains especially is the statement which he says I made that the Forestry Service was in collusion with the Weyerhaeusers and the railroads. I do not believe that I used as strong language as that. In fact, while the gentleman from Kansas has taken occasion to berate me for the language used, I think when he looks through my speech he will find that I accused no one of crime and that I impugned the motives of no one, something that the gentleman can certainly not say in regard to statements that he has made. What I did say was that the Forest Service, through its acts from its beginning until now, has worked in the interests of the Weyerhaeusers and the railroads, and I have no apology to make for that statement. When you recall the fact that they have withdrawn and placed in forest reserves one-fourth of all of the standing timber on the Pacific coast, you do not have to continue the argument to show that they have very greatly increased the value of the holdings of the Weyerhaeusers and the railroads. Whether they did that innocently or ignorantly I do not undertake to say. My own view about it is that they did it ignorantly, but the effect is the same. I pointed out yesterday that of the 23,000 square miles of forest land in the national forest reserves in the State of Washington at the present rate they were cutting it would take 35,000 years to cut over it once, and no man can dispute that statement. Do you mean to tell me that such condition is not in the interests of the Weyerhaeusers and the railroads, who own the other timber lands of the country? Besides that, when the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and my distinguished colleague [Mr. BRYAN] talk about the interests, do they deny what I stated yesterday when I said that the Weyerhaeusers and James J. Hill and Mr. Finley and these other railroad presidents have contributed their money and their influence to this conservation movement?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not a fact that Mr. Hill, to whom the gentleman referred, is the greatest enemy of this Forestry Bureau, and at St. Paul did he not advance the proposition of State control and almost get into a fight with Francis J. Heney because they differed so widely upon the subject?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to say in reply to the gentleman that the president of the Conservation Association—if that is the name of it—was reported in the papers, as I was told, when he made his inauguration address, as saying that James J. Hill gave $63,000 to start the conservation movement in the United States. Whether he told the truth, I do not know.

Mr. AUSTIN rose.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield now, because I want to reply to a few statements made by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, I think the gentleman ought to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will, if the gentleman will get me an extension of time.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will ask for it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Very well.

Mr. AUSTIN. Inasmuch as the gentleman has used the name of President Finley, who is the head of a railroad organization in my section of the country, I wish to say to the gentleman that if he has any evidence that Mr. Finley has profited by this legislation I would like him to state it, because I have the utmost confidence in the honesty and integrity of Mr. Finley, of the Southern Railroad Co.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have not reflected on the honor or integrity of any of those gentlemen. I have said they were members of the organization of the American Forestry Association. Is that accusing them of anything reprehensible?

Mr. AUSTIN. But the gentleman proved on yesterday, I think, that Mr. Hill had benefited.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I made no such statement or insinuation and do not now. These gentlemen are all the time preaching that any man who says a word or makes any criticism upon the way the Forest Service is conducted is in favor of the "interests." I want to ask them why they do not name these interests.

Now they talk about the robbery that has taken place. My friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] talks about the steal that is taking place in the West. Perhaps some of the public lands have been taken in the West by those who were not honestly entitled to them, but I challenge the gentleman to point out 100 acres for every 10,000 that went to the railroads and the Weyerhaeuser interests under the administration of the Forest Service. He does not attempt to deny that this is true, but now he makes the confession—not exactly a confession and avoidance, but he makes a confession and a whine. He says that when this valuable land was given to the railroads for these worthless lands in the national forests that Congress was responsible for it. Congress was responsible for the legislation. He denounces these transfers now as a steal, little short of a crime, and so does my colleague from Washington, but I challenge them to show where the Forest Service or anyone connected with it ever objected to any one of these transfers——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman intend to yield later?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I intend to yield in a moment.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has made a very serious statement.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You take the transfers that occurred in Arizona to the Santa Fe Railroad, you take the transfers that occurred in the Northwest to the Northern Pacific Railroad; during all that time it was the duty of the Forester and those in connection with the Forest Service if these were not proper transactions to call the attention of Congress to them. Congress is to blame for enacting the legislation that made it possible. That is what I pointed out yesterday; but if this thing were highway robbery, if it was wrong, and we all know it was, what were the people connected with the Forest Service doing? Why did not they call attention to the facts? Why did not they let it be known that these acres which were absolutely worthless were given to the Government and in exchange the railroads were permitted to select the best timbered lands upon the public domain?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If I can get an extension of five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. You can not get it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not guarantee that.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman know who recommended and favored the addition to the forest reserve in the North Yellowstone Park while the legislation to repeal the lieu-land laws was before Congress—who recommended that that addition be made in these railroad lands?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I do not; but if the gentleman knows I will yield to him. I have been trying to get information of that description.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman know whether the people connected with the Forestry Service favored it or objected to it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, I have the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming, if he will permit me to state it, that the Forest Service was urging it and he was opposing it; but it is true 240,000 acres of that land, according to the best information that I can obtain, during the pendency of that bill in the Senate, was placed in the forest reserve, scrip issued for it, land practically worthless, and that the Northern Pacific Railroad did get 240,000 acres of the best timbered land in the public domain. Now, just this one thing. I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas whether or not he is opposed to this resolution. He admits with me that these transfers were wrong; that a great fraud has been perpetrated upon the Government. Is he opposed to investigating and finding out whether Congress is to blame or the Forest Service? If the Forest Service is innocent, then why not investigate?

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; not now. I am making no charges further than I have already made, but I ask the gentleman whether or not, with all of his talk here upon the floor of this House, with all of his talk upon the Chautauqua platforms throughout the country about publicity, what objection has he to such an investigation? What objection has he to letting the facts be known to the country? Let us find out why the Santa Fe got a million and a quarter of acres and who is responsible; let us find out how the Northern Pacific got 450,000 acres of fine timberland for worthless mountain tops. I supposed the gentleman from Kansas, when he rose to speak, would be urging that the Forest Service be investigated. If the Forest Service is composed of the saints that he would have you believe, why not let it be known?

I do not care to discuss in detail the question of forest reserves that contain no forests. I asked the Forester to give me the number of acres of nontimbered land included in the forest reserves, and his reply was that he could not furnish the information. It is approximately correct, as I stated yesterday, that one-third of all the forest reserves contain no merchantable timber, never did, and never will, and a great portion of this was knowingly set aside for pasture or for other purposes besides forest protection. In the Southwest I have the highest authority, at least, for saying that the forest reserves were not created for the purpose of protecting the forests, nor did they pretend that they contain forests. Mr. Gifford Pinchot, on September 3, 1903, wrote a letter from Los Angeles, Cal., to the Hon. W. A. Richards, General Land Office, Washington, D. C., in which he makes the following statement:

> Water is practically the sole output of the forest reserves in this region, and it appears to me that this action on the part of the United States is precisely in line with the policy which has dictated the setting aside of all the reserves in this region.

This letter was written by Mr. Pinchot in reference to the exchange of 48,000 acres of land owned by a private company near Santa Barbara, Cal., for 48,000 acres of nontimbered land outside of the forest reserve. This exchange was afterwards consummated. I referred to this transaction yesterday when I pointed out that the Commissioner of the General Land Office had opposed this exchange upon the ground that it would not be fair to the United States, as the land owned by the company was practically of no value, being estimated to be worth only 40 cents an acre. I stated that, in spite of the protest of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, this exchange was made. My colleague [Mr. BRYAN] has quoted the letter above in its entirety in his remarks to show that I had done Mr. Pinchot an injustice when I claimed that he favored this transaction. I quote from the letter again. It is as follows:

> You will remember that the difficulty in the case has arisen from the lieu-land question. I am informed that Mr. Washburn has agreed to take untimbered land in one of the Dakotas for his holdings back of Santa Barbara. From the condition of the water supply, I am strongly of the opinion that even at the cost of a relatively poor bargain by the Government, which from the present situation I apprehend is not to be feared, it would be wise to make the exchange.

If I understand the plain and ordinary meaning of the English language, the words above quoted show that Mr. Pinchot was in favor of this exchange. If these words do not so indicate, then I have done Mr. Pinchot an injustice, as it was largely upon this statement that I said that he favored this Santa Barbara deal.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will withhold his motion for a second.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will withhold it for a second, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to give notice that at the meeting of the House on Friday I shall ask unanimous consent to address the House for one hour.

Mr. MURDOCK. Before that is acted upon, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will make it simply "revise" if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is afraid of my making it "extend."

Mr. MANN. I want it "to extend."

Mr. MURDOCK. There are two matters from the Chief Forester that I would like to include.

Mr. MANN. I was not going to object, but I was going to say that I would object to such requests hereafter.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is the gentleman objecting to my revising or extending? Which one?

Mr. MANN. Simply with regard to the request to extend.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman from Kansas will make it clear that in my interruption, when I said that I denied a certain statement, the statement which I denied was the gentleman's statement that the speech made yesterday by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] represented the Republican view of the forestry question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will not withhold my motion for a renewal of this interparty warfare.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order already made, until Friday, June 6, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware will state the question of personal privilege.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In the RECORD of Monday's proceedings, I find it stated that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] announced a pair between the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and myself, after which I appear as having voted on the question of reconsidering the amendment of the rules. In order that the RECORD may be correct I merely wish to state, so far as I am individually concerned, that the understanding as to the pair between the junior Senator from Rhode Island and myself was that we would protect each other on political questions, and I did not consider that I was paired on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The explanation made by the Senator from Delaware will be noted in the RECORD.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS (H. DOC. NO. 58).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules of papers, documents, etc., on the files of the Treasury Department which are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historical interest. Mr. STERLING. I present a memorial signed by citizens of South Dakota, relative to the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures, as follows:

PETITION TO UNITED STATES SENATE.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

Believing—

(1) In the separation of church and state:

(2) That Congress is prohibited by the Constitution from enacting any law enforcing the observance of any religious institution, or looking toward a union of church and state, or of religion and civil government;

(3) That any such legislation is oposed to the best interests of both church and state; and

(4) That the first step in this direction is a dangerous step, and should be opposed by every lover of liberty:

We, the undersigned, adult residents of the State of South Dakota, earnestly petition your honorable body not to pass the Johnston Sunday bill, S. 752, entitled "A bill for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia," or any like measure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Street and Water Commissioners of Newark, N. J., remonstrating against the abandonment of the port of Newark and its consolidation with the port of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROOT. I present a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, from the Fruit Importers' Union, of New York City, relative to the proposed change in the capacity of lemon boxes as provided for in the pending tariff bill. I move that the telegram be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of sundry veterans of the Civil War, residents of the State of Illinois, praying for the repeal of the law suspending the so-called arrearage pension act, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRISTOW presented a petition of the congregation of the Quinton Heights Baptist Church, of Topeka, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transportation of opium and cocaine except for medicinal purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send to the desk a resolution adopted by the Merchants' Association of the State of Connecticut, and ask that it be read. It is a very brief resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

The Merchants' Association of Connecticut, in annual convention assembled, with members represented in every city of the State, have—

Resolved, That in view of the reduction in customs which will be effected by the tariff bill now under discussion by Congress, and the fact that the retail merchants must at all times carry much merchandise in advance of their immediate requirements, and in view of the fact that a great deal of this merchandise will be lowered in price by the passage of this tariff measure now under consideration: Therefore be it further

Resolved, That an earnest request be made to all the Senators and Representatives of the State of Connecticut in Congress that a period of four months be allowed between the time of the enactment of this new tariff measure and its enforcement, thereby giving time to the retail merchant to dispose of much of his stock on hand and arrange his requirements to avoid excessive loss through the enforcement of the new tariff law without sufficient time to adjust stock to new conditions.

ADMINISTRATIVE FEATURES OF THE NEW TARIFF BILL (S. DOC. NO. 53).

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have printed as a Senate document an article from the New York Journal of Commerce of May 28, 29, and 31, in regard to certain administrative features of the tariff bill. It is a very short article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? There being no objection, the request of the Senator from Massachusetts will be granted.

SUGAR INDUSTRY OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. REED. I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Detroit (Mich.) News, dated April 25, 1913, bearing upon the sugar industry of that State.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Detroit News, Apr. 25, 1913.]

BUYERS OF MICHIGAN SUGAR CO. STOCK PAID $5,000,000 FOR GOOD WILL—LESS THAN HALF THE STOCK SOLD IS REPRESENTED BY TANGIBLE PROPERTY—EXACTLY $4,500,000 WAS ADDED TO THE "VALUE" OF THE "GOOD WILL" IN A SINGLE YEAR—SUGAR TRUST NOW OWNS MOST OF PREFERRED STOCK, WHICH HAS FIRST TITLE TO PROPERTY THAT NOW EXISTS.

When buyers of stock of the Michigan Sugar Co. invested their money they got $5,000,000 worth of "good will" for their cash.

They also invested $909,165.90 in stock that is represented by no value at all, either tangible or intangible.

The value of the tangible holdings of the company do not amount to one-half the amount of stock sold.

The last report of the financial condition of the company, filed with the secretary of state (July 3, 1912), shows the following "assets":

Real estate	$2,994,217.41
Goods, chattels, merchandise, materials, and other tangible property	1,509,007.13
Cash on hand and in banks	275,171.05
Good will	5,000,000.00
Credits due company	487,038.51
Total	10,265,434.10

The stock issues of the company are listed as follows:

Common stock sold and paid for	$7,471,100.00
Preferred stock sold and paid for	3,703,500.00
Total	11,174,600.00

The "good will" of the company was carried on the books at $500,000 until 1909, when $4,500,000 more was added to this item, making the total $5,000,000.

Taking the "good will" out of the assets it leaves $5,265,434.10 of tangible property.

It means that the Michigan Sugar Co. was doing business with that amount of real value, was formed with an authorized capitalization of $12,500,000, of which stock $11,174,600 was sold and paid for.

That means for every $100 of stock sold only $47 of real property was put into the company.

The question that naturally interests the men, their wives, daughters, and sons who have invested in the common stock of this company is, What is the real value of their holdings now?

The preferred stock comes in first. There is $3,703,500 of this stock out. More than half of this preferred stock is owned by the Sugar Trust—to be exact, $2,043,800 worth.

Deducting the preferred stock from the tangible property and the following is reached:

Value of tangible property	$5,265,434.10
Amount of preferred stock	3,703,500.00
Difference	1,561,934.10

Against this value of $1,561,934.10 over and above the preferred stock there has been $7,471,100 worth of common stock sold and paid for.

That is, for every dollar of value in property above the preferred stock there has been $5 of common stock sold. This common stock is held by the "investing public."

The amount of stock sold in excess of the tangible value of the property is $5,909,165.90.

At the company's office in this city the News was told that the company did not care to give out to the public the amounts that had been paid in dividends.

"I don't think it is a matter that interests the public," said Secretary Douglas. "The statement of dividends concerns the stockholders only."

With the sugar companies asking that the tariff on their product be continued and that the public pay for it, there is much interest at this time.

With the company refusing to give exact information, the nearest accurate statement available is from the evidence given by Charles B. Warren, president of the company, before the congressional committee.

In 1906 the company was formed with $4,644,153.26 worth of property.

This was capitalized at $12,500,000 and $9,245,755 of stock issued on the property that year.

The company, for the first four years, paid 6 per cent dividends on the preferred stock and 6 per cent one year and 7 per cent another year on the common stock, had a surplus left of about $3,000,000, making the total profit of about $4,000,000 for the four years, or about $1,000,000 a year. The surplus was afterwards distributed among the stockholders in the shape of stock dividends.

The investment (in round figures) of $5,000,000 paid 11 per cent on a capitalization of $9,000,000.

Here is where the tariff comes into the question and is of vital interest to both holders of sugar stock and buyers of sugar for table use.

The Democrats figure if a company goes into business with an investment of $5,000,000 and gets 6 per cent on the investment it does fairly well.

Six per cent on the $5,000,000 invested in the Michigan Sugar Co. would produce an annual dividend amounting to $300,000.

To raise 6 per cent on the $5,000,000 of assets classed as "good will" would require another $300,000 a year, but, according to Mr. Warren, the company was able to raise both items during each of the first four years and have $400,000 a year besides.

Mr. Warren's testimony covered up to 1910. What the company's profits have been since then can not be stated, as the officers in charge refuse the information.

The Democrats figure that if the company can pay the profits it did under the tariff, it can pay a reasonable profit without the tariff, and that the $300,000 asked for dividends on "good will" should remain in the hands of the consumers by reducing the price of sugar.

The Republicans claim to take the tariff off will injure the industry and reduce the profit to nothing.

Charles B. Warren, the president of the Michigan Sugar Co., who unloaded most of his holdings in the company before the recent slump in market price of stock, reducing his interest from $455,000 to $84,000, has invested in a Minnesota sugar factory.

A statement sent out by the Wholesale Grocers' Committee on holdings of the Sugar Trust says:

"In 1912 the Sugar Trust announced the sale of its holdings in the Carver County Sugar Co. (Minnesota) to Charles B. Warren, president of the Michigan Sugar Co. The effect of this transfer was a change of name to the Minnesota Sugar Co., and the increase in the capital stock from $600,000 under the trust to $1,200,000 under Mr. Warren and the rest of his associates of the Michigan Sugar Co. The officers of the Iowa Sugar Co., with one or two exceptions, are either officers or directors of the Michigan Sugar Co."

We desire to point out that none of the beet-sugar companies, who are so earnestly asking for the privilege of taxing the American people through a high tariff, have coupled with their pleadings a statement of their earnings for, say, the last three years, so that these might be compared with their actual investment.

Mr. JONES. Do I understand the Chair to ask whether there is any objection?

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The ayes have it, and the Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report this day submitted by Mr. FLETCHER from the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 57, Sixty-third Congress, first session.]

COMMITTEE REPORT.

The Committee on Commerce having had under consideration S. 2258, entitled "A bill to extend the proposed reorganization of the customs service for a period of two years," submit the following report. The committee caused a copy of the bill to be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, with the request that he furnish the committee with such information as is shown by the records of his office relating to the necessity for the enactment of any such legislation at this time. The Secretary has stated his views in a communication, which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 3, 1913.

Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 29th ultimo, submitting bill S. 2258 for comments and recommendations.

The plan of reorganization adopted by the President on March 3 last provides for an organization of the customs service which, on the whole, is an improvement on the present arrangement of customs districts and ports. There are some objections to the plan which could undoubtedly be overcome if the time should be extended for putting it into operation.

The reorganization as adopted is an extension of the plan followed by Congress in the creation of the present Puget Sound district, which includes the whole of the State of Washington and comprises 22 ports, with headquarters at Port Townsend. Seattle, in this district, collects about one and one-half million dollars in duties and has exports of over twenty-two millions. Some of the ports are seaports and others are frontier ports, and all phases of customs practice are presented. The large volume of business in this district is transacted with expedition and with great economy, and the plan followed in the reorganization is, therefore, not an experiment.

The department has received a number of communications from various Senators and Representatives in Congress, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and individuals adverse to the proposed reorganization, but most of these protests have been based either on erroneous conceptions of the actual working of the plan or upon feelings of local pride. They do not alone, in my opinion, present valid or serious grounds for deferring the operations of the reorganization.

However, the plan has also been subjected to the criticism that it does not comply with the law, in that the estimate of expenditures under it is in excess of $10,150,000, the amount which, under a strict construction of the act, might possibly be considered as the maximum amount authorized. While this criticism may be unsound as a matter of law, still, in view of its existence, and of the further fact that the reorganization as adopted by the President does not comprehend several administrative changes in the customs service which should be included in order to make a thorough and efficient organization, I have the honor to recommend that the bill be passed subject to the following amendments:

First. That the time of the taking effect of the reorganization be postponed to January 1, 1914, instead of July 1, 1915; and

Second. That the limitation placed upon the estimate of expenditures shall be to an amount not in excess of the amount actually expended for such service in the fiscal year 1913, less $500,000. As thus amended it would read as follows, in which form I recommend that it be adopted:

"A bill to extend the proposed reorganization of the customs service for a period of six months.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the execution of the provisions of chapter 355 of the Statutes at Large, entitled 'An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes,' approved August 24, 1912, in so far as they relate to the reorganization of the customs service, shall be extended until January 1, 1914.

"That estimates submitted in compliance with such provisions shall be on account of the second half of the fiscal year 1914, and the reorganization ordered by such provisions shall constitute for the second half of the fiscal year 1914 and, until otherwise provided by Congress, the permanent organization of the customs service: Provided, That the estimates to be submitted therefor shall show a reduction in the total cost of such service per annum to an amount not in excess of the amount actually expended for such service in the fiscal year 1913, less $500,000."

In view of the shortness of time before the 1st of July, I beg to suggest that if any action is to be taken in this regard it be expedited as far as possible.

Respectfully, W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

The committee finds that there is a very general complaint about the manner in which the customs districts in the country were reorganized under the order made by President Taft just before he retired from the Presidency. Though indicating no opinion as to whether or not these complaints are justified to an extent that requires the intervention of Congress, the committee has reached the conclusion that it will best promote the public service to afford a period when such complaints may be thoroughly investigated, to the end that such as are found to be meritorious may be corrected by Executive action. Without imputing fault to anyone, the committee is inclined to believe that the order promulgated by the President reorganizing the customs district was, from necessity, prepared under conditions where more or less haste was required, and, as a consequence, several features of the order are challenged by interested persons and localities as being unfair and improvident. The committee feels that no serious injury will come to the public service by continuing the Executive character of the process of reorganization until the 1st of January, 1914.

The committee accordingly recommends that the bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the form of bill suggested by the Secretary, except as modified by the committee. The modification suggested by the committee is that instead of the words "execution of" the words "performance by the President of the acts and things authorized to be done and performed by him under" be substituted, so that the provision will read:

"That the time for the performance by the President of the acts and things authorized to be done and performed by him under the provisions of chapter 355 of the Statutes at Large," etc.

The committee further recommends that the title of the bill be amended by striking out the words "two years" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "six months," and that the bill as so amended and modified do pass.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator from Washington objects to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. I am very sorry to do so, but I feel compelled to object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes to the calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under the objection, I presume the bill will have to go over until to-morrow. Then I shall move to take up the bill at the earliest opportunity.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 97, authorizing the Committee on Commerce or any subcommittee thereof to hold hearings, and so forth, submitted by Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas on the 29th ultimo, to report it with amendments; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asks the Senator from Colorado to let the resolution go over. The committee of which the Chair is chairman is interested in the matter. The Chair does not know the extent of the amendments which have been reported, and until opportunity is afforded him to make the examination he asks that the matter go over.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM W. ST. JOHN.

Mr. SHAFROTH. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 96, submitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] on the 29th ultimo, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in line 3, after the words "Senate to," to strike out "Lucy St. John Tate, sister," and insert "the executor, administrator, or legal heirs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the executor, administrator, or legal heirs of William W. St. John, late assistant clerk to the Committee on Coast Defenses of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to introduce the bills which I send to the desk.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, under Rule XIV, I desire to object to the introduction of any bills to-day. I ask that bills may go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the Senator's privilege. Objection is made.

Mr. BRISTOW. I introduce certain bills which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, they will be considered as read the first and second times and appropriately referred.

Mr. JONES. I desire to object to the introduction of the bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects to the introduction of the bills. They will therefore lie over.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer sundry bills for reference.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to ask that they go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the introduction of the bills, under the rule they will have to lie over one day.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I introduce a bill to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects to the introduction of the bill, and under the rule it will go over for one day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I introduce two bills for reference.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects, and under the rule the bills will lie over for a day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill to waive the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Theodore S. Coulbourn.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects, and under the rule the bill will lie over for one day.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

EXCISE TAX ON TOBACCO MANUFACTURES.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to submit an amendment to the pending tariff bill in order that it may be printed.

Mr. JONES. If it is simply an amendment I take it that it does not come under the objection that I am making.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before I yield the floor I desire to say that this amendment is the same amendment which I offered a year ago to the then pending excise bill, which was sent here by the House of Representatives. It embodies the recent recommendation of the Attorney General in favor of a graduated excise tax upon the products of companies engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, and cigarettes. It is designed not only to raise revenue by levying a high tax upon the great corporations that practically dominate the market at the present time but it is designed also as a regulatory measure so to handicap those great concerns that the lesser concerns, the independent companies, may have an opportunity to live.

Congress made a serious effort when it passed the Sherman antitrust law to destroy monopolies, and when the Supreme Court of the United States declared that the Tobacco Trust was a monopoly, and that it came under the provisions of that law, the country fondly hoped that the monopoly would be destroyed; but through a blunder or through inadvertence or through some other cause that decision of the Supreme Court was practically nullified. In the final work of drafting the decrees of dissolution the Department of Justice made a woeful blunder. This received the approval of the President and permitted that great Tobacco Trust practically to be divided into four associate trusts, owned by the same stockholders and controlled by the same men. Those great companies have continued since that time to operate and control the market as fully and with as enormous profits as did the original trust, and the question is whether the people of the United States and the Congress of the United States shall permit that condition to continue without any effort to remedy it.

It is probably impossible for the present administration to interfere with the decree of the court as it has been entered, but it is possible in a summary way for Congress to use its great powers of taxation to regulate, if not to destroy, the several great associate trusts, just as the power of taxation has been used on previous occasions to destroy. It was used to destroy issues of State banks and to check and handicap the oleomargarine industry for the benefit of the dairy interests. Only a year or two ago Congress used its great power of taxation to kill the manufacture of poisonous matches.

So, Mr. President, I have drawn this amendment at this session in practically the same language in which I drew it at the session a year ago, proposing to exempt from its operations the products of those companies which are on a competitive basis, those companies which are doing business in a legitimate way, but so designed as to fall upon the great concerns whose monopoly power is so great that they are gradually wiping out the competition that still lingers in the manufacture of tobacco.

Mr. President, this amendment is not drawn so as to provide for littleness; it is not drawn so as to destroy manufacture upon a large scale and in an efficient way. I exempt, for instance, from this tax a tobacco product up to 80,000,000 pounds a year. Any concern that manufactures even so great a product as 80,000,000 pounds of tobacco a year will pay nothing except the ordinary tax of 8 cents a pound; but if its manufacture goes beyond that point and exceeds 25 per cent of the total product of the whole country, then it becomes subject to this tax. The extra tax is graduated. Upon the first 4,000,000 pounds over the 80,000,000 pounds the tax is 1 cent a pound; upon the next 4,000,000 pounds it is 2 cents a pound; and so it is graduated up until it reaches 6 cents a pound, which is practically prohibitory. Any company now existing which manufactures such a quantity as would subject it to the 6 cents a pound extra tax would be compelled, under the operations of this proposed law, to dissolve itself as a financial necessity, if not by the decree of the court, and sell its factories to companies that would operate in a legitimate way in competition. A real dissolution would be achieved.

So with cigarettes. The total manufacture of cigarettes in this country is about 10,000,000,000 a year. I propose in this amendment to exempt from additional taxation any company manufacturing not over 1,600,000,000 cigarettes a year, and, after that point is passed, to impose a graduated tax, rising in rate as the quantity increases, until it becomes impossible for a company to monopolize the cigarette market. So also similar provisions of this amendment relate to snuff and little cigars and large cigarettes. The design is not simply to kill the great companies that now dominate and threaten the market, but it is to enable the struggling companies making ten, fifteen, or twenty million pounds of tobacco a year to live. As it is now, they will not be able to live long. In a few years they will be wiped out; and we will only have four great concerns owned by the same people, controlled by the same men, and practically just as much a trust as was the original trust which the court declared to be a trust and which it sought to destroy.

So, Mr. President, I think we have the right in this bill while raising additional taxes providing additional revenue that may be needed because of a reduction of customs duties to impose this additional internal-revenue tax only applicable to the great producers or manufacturers who are violators of the spirit of the law at the present time.

I trust that the Finance Committee—and I address myself particularly now to the chairman of the Finance Committee, at whose instance I was persuaded last year not to make a strong fight for my amendment—I particularly urge him at this time to take this amendment under favorable consideration in his committee. It is designed not only to raise some revenue but I believe it is designed to put into real operation the will of Congress for the destruction of monopoly in this particular industry. If it works in this industry, it may work in others also, and certainly the experiment is well worth the trial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

INVESTIGATION OF ATTEMPTS TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and which I ask may be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina submits a resolution which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 102) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of the investigation of the charge of a "lobby being maintained in Washington" ordered by the Senate under resolution May 29, 1913, be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary or the chairman of the subcommittee thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the law the resolution automatically goes to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. That is not a joint resolution, is it?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, sir; not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made accordingly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in this connection, Senate resolution 92, known as the lobbying-investigation resolution, required the committee conducting the investigation to report within 10 days. Your committee has been holding morning, afternoon, and night sessions, but it will be utterly impossible for it to make a report by next Saturday. Therefore I am requested by the subcommittee conducting the investigation to ask the Senate to extend the time in which it shall make its report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In what parliamentary form does the Senator from North Carolina present the request?

Mr. OVERMAN. That the time be extended in which the committee may make the report.

Mr. SMOOT. How long will it probably take?

Mr. OVERMAN. It may take two or three or four days longer than the time specified in the original resolution. I will make it indefinite, and say that we will report as soon as we can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina request unanimous consent that that enlargement of time be granted?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the time within which the committee now investigating the so-called lobby was required to report may be extended beyond the limitation of 10 days, specified in the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I regret very much to have to object to that request.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then I move that the time be extended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution can not be considered on the day on which it is introduced in the face of objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. The committee will not be able to report within 10 days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not in order, because the Chair treated the request as in the nature of a resolution, and it will be laid over one day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then we can not carry out the order of the Senate. It will be impossible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is for the Senate to determine; it is not for the Chair.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand that the Senator from Washington insists upon his objection?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The committee, then, will exercise its own judgment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it not be in order at the present time to move to amend that portion of the resolution by which the committee was instructed to report within 10 days?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be done by reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. OVERMAN'S motion was reduced to the form of a resolution (S. Res. 101), as follows:

Resolved, That the time when the Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to report to the Senate under the terms of Senate resolution 92, agreed to on May 29, 1913, be extended for a period of 10 days or until Wednesday, June 18, 1913.

DECISIONS OF UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read and referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 103) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate resolution, adopted on the 20th day of February, 1885, providing for furnishing to Senators pamphlet printed copies of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States be, and the same is hereby, annulled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what committee shall the resolution be referred?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think the appropriate committee is the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would depend altogether on whether or not the expense of furnishing these copies is paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; it is paid out of that fund, and we desire to have the former resolution repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

TUBERCULOSIS CURES.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 104), which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate such reports as have been made by officers of the United States Bureau of the Public Health and such documentary information as he may have upon the so-called tuberculosis cures.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I shall have to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects, and the resolution will go over.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD CO.

Mr. KENYON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 105), which was read:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission investigate, if it has not the evidence on hand, and report to the Senate all the facts and circumstances concerning the purchase of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co., and the subsequent receivership of both railroads, such information to contain the amount paid per share for both common and preferred stock of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co.; the time of the issuance of such stock and the amount thereof; guaranties, if any, made with reference thereto; amount of the bonds issued by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. at the time of the purchase of the said Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad; the location of the holders of said bonds; the amount of the same held in this country and abroad; and all the facts and circumstances involved in any way in the transactions between said railroad companies; and all the facts and circumstances leading up to said receiverships, and the progress of said receiverships to date; also the names and the capitalization and bond issues of all railroad and bridge companies controlled by said St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co.; the time of such acquisitions, how acquired, amount of bonds issued at the time of such acquisition, and all facts or circumstances involved in such purchase or control.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I shall have to ask that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects, and, under the rule, the resolution will lie over for one day.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, Senator from Illinois, be appointed as a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce in place of Senator KERN, who has resigned therefrom; also a member of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico in place of Senator THORNTON, who has resigned therefrom; also a member of the Committee on Printing in place of Senator HITCHCOCK, who has resigned therefrom; also a member of the Committee on Manufactures in place of Senator SAULSBURY, resigned; also a member of the Committee on National Banks in place of Senator CHAMBERLAIN, resigned; and also a member of the Committee on Railroads in place of Senator CLARKE of Arkansas, resigned.

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF A BILL.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the judicial district of the State of Colorado.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado, out of order, asks unanimous consent to introduce a bill at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I shall have to ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will lie over.

EXTRA CLERK FOR SENIOR SENATOR FROM WASHINGTON.

Mr. KENYON. I submit the following resolution, which I ask may be read. I should like to have immediate consideration, if there is no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 106) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] be allowed an extra clerk at $1,200 per year.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, even if the statute did not require the resolution to go to the committee I should object to it, because there are fifteen or twenty other Senators who are in the same position with me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution on its face does not provide that the expense of the clerk shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; otherwise it would be automatically referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. That would not relieve the situation at all. I must object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will go over. If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions, no resolution coming over from a former day, the calendar under Rule VIII is now in order.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 43 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 6, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to introduce a bill for proper reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey will withhold it for the present. Bills were presented yesterday and under objection laid over until to-day. Under the rule they will be submitted to the Senate and read the first time.

The SECRETARY. By Mr. NELSON, a bill (S. 2440) providing for the erection of a suitable monument on the grave of Maj. Gen. Henry W. Lawton in Arlington National Cemetery, in the State of Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the bill will be considered as read the second time and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. JONES. Is the reading merely of the title considered as a reading of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length if the Senate so determines.

Mr. JONES. I ask for the first reading of the bill at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question will be submitted to the Senate. Those in favor of having the bill read at length will say "aye."

Mr. JONES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has demanded that the bill introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] be read in full. It is the opinion of the Chair that the requirement of the second clause of Rule XIV will be satisfied by reading the bill by title. Of course, that ruling of the Chair may be modified and changed by the action of the Senate upon application in the proper form. The Chair is somewhat familiar with the decisions of the courts on similar language in the constitutions of several of the States; and it has uniformly been held that, where no other qualifying language was employed, the reading of a bill by title would satisfy the requirement that the bill should be read on three separate days. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, while I disagree with the opinion of the Chair, I am not going to take up the time of the Senate now to discuss the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can not be read a second time to-day in face of the objection of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I desire to object to the second reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the first time and laid over. It can not be referred until it has been read the second time. The Secretary will read the next bill, introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], by title.

(By request.) A bill (S. 2441) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the officering and manning of vessels subject to the inspection laws of the United States," approved March 3, 1913, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. JONES. I object to the second reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over.

The Chair inquires of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] if it is his purpose to object to the second reading of every bill?

Mr. JONES. I desire to object to the second reading of all bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A comprehensive objection will satisfy the requirement of the rule unless there is objection. The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will proceed to read the bills the first time.

The following bills, introduced by Mr. BRISTOW, were read the first time by their titles:

A bill (S. 2442) granting an increase of pension to Judson Bayne (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2443) granting an increase of pension to Van Buren Fisher (with accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2444) granting a pension to Maggie M. Lane;

A bill (S. 2445) for the relief of James H. Devlin; and

(By request.) A bill (S. 2446) providing for the adjustment and payment of accounts of laborers and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law.

The Secretary read the first time by their titles the following bills introduced by Mr. MCCUMBER:

A bill (S. 2447) granting a pension to Horace H. Lockwood;

A bill (S. 2448) for the relief of William Henry Hayden;

A bill (S. 2449) for the relief of the legal representatives of Jennie M. Hunt, deceased;

A bill (S. 2450) for the relief of Frederick J. Ernst;

A bill (S. 2451) for the relief of Margaret F. Watson; and

A bill (S. 2452) granting a pension to Catharine A. Riley (with accompanying papers).

The Secretary read the first time by its title the following bill introduced by Mr. SMITH of South Carolina:

A bill (S. 2453) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say that I do not wish to delay the Senate unnecessarily. There are a number of private bills which it is desired by Senators to introduce which may be handed to the Secretary; and to such procedure I have no objection whatever, so that pension bills and bills of that nature may be handed to the Secretary and introduced as provided by the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Members of the Senate will take notice of the concession made by the Senator from Washington.

The Secretary read the first time by their titles the following bills introduced by Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2454) authorizing an investigation by the Secretary of Agriculture to develop a cotton-gin compress that may be constructed at a price within the reach of individuals and organizations of average means, and to encourage the use thereof; and

A bill (S. 2455) for the relief of the heirs of George S. Thebo.

The Secretary read the first time by its title the following bill introduced by Mr. SAULSBURY:

A bill (S. 2456) to waive the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Theodore S. Coulbourn.

The Secretary read the first time by its title the following bill introduced by Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 2457) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the judicial district of the State of Colorado.

The Secretary read the first time by its title the following bill introduced by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 2458) granting a pension to Seaman W. Potter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has introduced a bill, which, without objection, will be considered as read the first and second times.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask that the bill go over until to-morrow. I object.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I give notice that I shall call up the bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over under the rule.

The Secretary read the first time by its title the following bill introduced by Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey:

A bill (S. 2493) to provide for the placing of the temporary employees of the Census Bureau on the permanent roll of the civil service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will lie over for a day.

Mr. CATRON. I desire to introduce certain bills for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico introduces bills which, without objection, will be read the first and second times.

Mr. JONES. I desire to object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects.

The following bills introduced by Mr. CATRON were read the first time by their titles:

A bill (S. 2494) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Clayton, in the State of New Mexico; and

A bill (S. 2495) granting an increase of pension to Eugenia Chavez de Montano.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, the bills will lie over for a day.

Mr. PERKINS. I introduce a bill, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California introduces a bill, which, without objection, will be read the first and second time.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects.

The Secretary read the first time by title the following bill, introduced by Mr. PERKINS.

A bill (S. 2496) granting to the city and county of San Francisco certain rights of way in, over, and through certain public lands, the Yosemite National Park, the Stanislaus National Forest, and certain lands in the Yosemite National Park, the Stanislaus National Forest, and the public lands in the State of California, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will lie over for a day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to introduce sundry bills.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the proffer of the bills, but will ask that they go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to offer the bills, and then, if the Senator objects, they will go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado introduces certain bills, which, under objection of the Senator from Washington, will be laid over for one day. The Secretary will read the titles of the bills.

The Secretary read the first time by their titles the following bills, introduced by Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 2497) granting an increase of pension to W. H. Hyatt;

A bill (S. 2498) granting a pension to Helena A. Edic; and

A bill (S. 2499) granting an increase of pension to John Wade.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to introduce a bill to regulate the employment of agents, counsel, and attorneys engaged to secure the passage or defeat of legislation by Congress; to prohibit persons and corporations interested in the passage or defeat of legislation, and their counsel, agents, and attorneys, from attempting to influence Members of the Senate and House of Representatives other than by oral and written arguments and briefs submitted to regularly constituted committees; providing for a return of expenses incurred, and prescribing penalties for the violation of the provisions thereof.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the bill may go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects. The bill will lie over for a day.

INVESTIGATION OF ATTEMPTS TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call up, out of order, a resolution which comes regularly before the Senate to-day, which simply extends the time within which the committee that is investigating the lobby may make its report. The reason I am asking indulgence at this time, instead of waiting until the resolution is regularly reached, is simply in order that the committee may resume its labors. There are some witnesses waiting. I hope the Senator from Washington will not object to our calling the resolution up at this time, for it would come up at any rate after the reading of bills.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I recognize the great importance of having this inquiry prosecuted with rapidity. I shall not delay it and will not object to the request of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks for the present consideration of Senate resolution 101, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 101) submitted by Mr. OVERMAN on June 5, 1913, as follows:

Resolved, That the time when the Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to report to the Senate under the terms of Senate resolution 92, agreed to on May 29, 1913, be extended for a period of 10 days, or until Wednesday, June 18, 1913.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. REED. I move to amend the resolution, in line 4, before the word "days," by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty"; in line 5, after the word "until," by striking out "Wednesday" and inserting "Saturday"; and in the same line, after the word "June," by striking out "eighteenth" and inserting "twenty-eighth," so that the extension of time will be 20 days instead of 10 days. I am moving these amendments with the consent of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Missouri.

The Secretary read the resolution as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the time when the Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to report to the Senate under the terms of Senate resolution 92, agreed to on May 29, 1913, be extended for a period of 20 days, or until Saturday, June 28, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

TUBERCULOSIS CURES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 104) submitted by Mr. BRISTOW on the 5th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate such reports as have been made by officers of the United States Bureau of the Public Health and such documentary information as he may have upon the so-called tuberculosis cures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 105), submitted by Mr. KENYON on the 5th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission investigate, if it has not the evidence on hand, and report to the Senate all the facts and circumstances concerning the purchase of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co., and the subsequent receivership of both railroads, such information to contain the amount paid per share for both common and preferred stock of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad by the St. Louis and San Francisco Railroad Co.; the time of the issuance of such stock and the amount thereof; guaranties, if any, made with reference thereto; amount of the bonds issued by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. at the time of the purchase of the said Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad; the location of the holders of said bonds; the amount of the same held in this country and abroad; and all the facts and circumstances involved in any way in the transactions between said railroad companies; and all the facts and circumstances leading up to said receiverships, and the progress of said receiverships to date; also the names and the capitalization and bond issues of all railroad and bridge companies controlled by said St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co.; the time of such acquisitions, how acquired, amount of bonds issued at the time of such acquisition, and all facts or circumstances involved in such purchase or control.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever, so far as I know, to this information being had, but it does seem to me, without being very familiar with the details which must necessarily be involved in this matter, that it would impose an immense labor upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to gather this information and make this report. As we know, the Interstate Commerce Commission has now an immense burden placed upon it by recent legislation calling for the valuation of railroads and everything connected with them.

I repeat I have no objection in the world to the resolution, and it may be very important to get this information, but I suppose, of course, the Senator from Iowa, before introducing the resolution, has considered the question both as to the importance of it and as to the amount of labor which will be devolved upon the commission if the resolution shall be adopted; and so, before voting upon it, I should be very glad if the Senator would advise us in this respect. What is the estimate of the Senator as to the amount of labor which will be involved in making this investigation and the time necessary to make it?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think it is not a useless——

Mr. BACON. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I could not hear all the Senator from Georgia said either, so that I am a little in the dark. It is impossible for me to state what length of time will be necessary to make this investigation. I assume that the commission has nearly all the facts. I would not want to burden the commission unnecessarily, but it does seem to me that this information is important. The question of the Federal control of stock and bond issues will at some future time become a very important question here. Already there is agitation of the question of raising the rates on the railroads, and this receivership is cited in many quarters as showing some of the causes which make the raising of rates necessary.

There is a third proposition of the stock held in other countries and the ill effect of such proceedings upon our stock held abroad.

I have some knowledge of the circumstances surrounding this receivership, but not sufficient; and it does seem to me that, in a matter of this kind, the Interstate Commerce Commission, without an unusual expenditure of time, could furnish such information as would be profitable on these various questions.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he does not think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, in order that they may investigate the matter and see what time will probably be required to obtain the desired information?

Mr. KENYON. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask whether the Senator does not think it would be better to let the resolution go to the Interstate Commerce Committee to ascertain before it is adopted something about what time it will take to procure the information and what it will cost?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the suggestion which I was going to make to the Senator is that he now modify his resolution so as to not devolve, unless it should be necessary, an undue amount of labor upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. The suggestion is that the Senator modify his resolution so far as to require the Interstate Commerce Commission now to submit to the Senate what information they have, and then the Senate can easily determine whether we should enlarge the demand to this unlimited extent. This sets no limit whatever.

Anyone who has been familiar with these large railroad operations, and especially with receiverships and everything of that kind, every lawyer who has had any connection with them, knows the immensity of the details; and it seems to me, if the Senator would now simply ask for the passage of a resolution directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to send to the Senate such information as they have, then the Senator and other Senators can determine whether other information is desired; but if the resolution is passed in its present shape the commission must proceed, and there will be nothing for them to do but to go to the fullest extent required by the resolution, which is a very broad one.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator think it would require more than the work of one man, for not over two weeks, to make that kind of an investigation?

Mr. BACON. I may be mistaken about it, but I was under the impression that it would require a great deal more time than that.

Mr. KENYON. I should not think so.

Mr. BACON. If it did not, I should have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. KENYON. In answer to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], can the Senator assure me that if this resolution should be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee there would be any meeting of that committee and any action by them? I understand there are to be no more meetings of that committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I do not know, I am sure. I am not a member of the committee and I have not had any conference with them. I assume, however, that they would meet.

Mr. KENYON. I understand there are to be no more meetings of the Interstate Commerce Committee at this special session.

Mr. BACON. They could very easily have a meeting.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the senior Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. As a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, I may say that we have had but one meeting since the committee was organized, and apparently that meeting was solely for the purpose of enabling the members to get acquainted with each other. We have done no business, and have not been called together to do any business, although there is a very large amount of business before the committee to be done.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the junior Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. I have nothing further, Mr. President, except to say that I confess the Senator surprises me very much when he says that one man can do this work in two weeks. I have no doubt the Senator has been connected with cases of this kind before, and I certainly have had knowledge of quite a number of them. My experience has been that all these matters involve an immensity of detail. I have been in cases where it took literally years to go through all the matters that were involved.

Mr. KENYON. In the preparation of a case, of course, that is true. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. BACON. No; I will not object, but I will ask the Senator from Iowa to act upon the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama. I will say to him that if the resolution is referred to the committee, and the committee does not report within a very short time, I will recognize the right of the Senator to ask that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the matter, and that the resolution then be taken up. If it is referred to the committee, the committee can confer with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we can have some data upon which to proceed in determining whether or not an investigation should be had.

Mr. KENYON. If the resolution could be sent to the committee and a report made within a week, I should have no objection. I assume that after that time we will be engaged in the tariff discussion here, which will take all our time.

Mr. BACON. The Senator always has the right, at any time, to ask for the discharge of a committee if it does not proceed with its work. If the Senator is correct in thinking that one man could do this work in two weeks, of course I should not have the slightest objection; but I think he is very much mistaken about that. He must be. In view of that fact, I suggest that he consent that the resolution go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with a full recognition of the right of the Senator, if the committee does not meet, to ask that it be discharged, and that the Senate act directly upon the resolution.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BACON. I yield the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I would suggest that he let this matter go over for a day and himself confer with the Interstate Commerce Commission and see about what time they think it will take. Then he would have definite information, and would not have to go upon any supposition.

Mr. BACON. I would be content with that.

Mr. KENYON. If that can be done without losing any rights in the matter, Mr. President, I will consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of the resolution be continued until the next session of the Senate, and that it retain its present place. Unless there is objection, such will be the order.

DECISIONS OF THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] introduced Senate resolution 103 and had it referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It provides—

That Senate resolution, adopted on the 20th day of February, 1885, providing for furnishing to Senators pamphlet-printed copies of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States be, and the same is hereby, annulled.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that subject matter ought to go to the Committee on Printing. The original resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing. I will say to the Senator, also, that this question has been before that committee on several occasions, and I believe that is where the resolution ought to be sent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, what induced me to offer the resolution was a bill which was presented to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. In passing on it we found that there was a charge of 80 cents a page for furnishing the 96 copies to the Senate. The printer has a contract with the Supreme Court, and runs these 96 copies off the forms which he sets up and then furnishes them to the Senators. We thought that was a very large charge, inasmuch as ordinarily one can get briefs printed for 50 or 60 cents a page, including the setting of the type. Therefore I introduced this resolution.

These copies are at present paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate. Consequently, I thought the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was the appropriate committee to which to refer the resolution. If it were a matter that involved having copies printed by the Public Printer, I could very readily see that the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Printing. But inasmuch as this is a purchase of the opinions for distribution among Senators, and inasmuch as the expense of that purchase has to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, it seems to me that the appropriate committee is the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that these copies are not printed at the Government Printing Office?

Mr. SHAFROTH. They are not.

Mr. SMOOT. The Supreme Court has a contract with whom?

Mr. SHAFROTH. With the J. L. Pearson Printing Office, Mr. Bright, manager. The Supreme Court has a contract of some kind. Whether it is in writing or not I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember the contract now, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The decisions do not go to the Public Printer at all.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The reason why it was thought that it should not go to the Public Printer was that if the Public Printer had to set up the type and then to print the same it would probably cost more than it does the present way.

It seems to me, however, that the expense is large. I have thought that the Members of the Senate do not read these opinions in the pamphlet form. They have 23 sets of Supreme Court decisions that are furnished to Senators in the Office Building, and then, of course, the Supreme Court library is here at our command. Inasmuch as this item of expense from the 6th day of February to the 30th day of April amounted to $468, it seemed to me that a saving could well be made by the Senate in this respect without detriment to the public service.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah has the floor. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I consider these opinions very valuable to the Members of the Senate. They give us the current decisions of the Supreme Court without waiting for the bound volumes. I am surprised, however, to hear of the expense. I will ask the Senator whether the Committee on Contingent Expenses has looked into the sort of contract under which the Senate is getting these copies?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, we can not hear what the Senator says.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I said that I consider these current decisions of the Supreme Court, when the court is in session, as of very great value to the Members of the Senate, and I should very much regret any action that would cut them off. I asked the Senator from Colorado if the committee had investigated at all in relation to the contract under which they are now furnished, and as to whether they could not be procured from the same parties at a more reasonable cost. The expense seems to me very great; but the necessity, I think, calls for the expenditure of a moderate amount.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will yield, I will state that the opinions may be of value to Senators; I would not say they were not; but when the matter was submitted to the committee, it struck me, as a member of the committee, that a charge of 80 cents a page for merely striking off 96 additional copies was preposterous.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I fully agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. It astounded me to think that the Senate was being buncoed by any such charge as that for the insignificant amount of labor which is required.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Therefore I made my suggestion and inquiry as to whether or not the committee had investigated the contract under which the copies are being furnished.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I examined the matter as far as I could. I went to the clerk of the Supreme Court and asked him concerning it, and he showed me a bill that had been rendered by this same firm to the Supreme Court, which provided for the payment of $2.95 per printed page. Inasmuch as that was not an expenditure coming before our committee, however, we did not deem it best to consider the matter until it came up in the general appropriation bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. May I ask the Senator whether the bill is rendered by the contractor to the Senate——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Or is it rendered to the clerk of the Supreme Court?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is rendered by the contractor; and the bills rendered to the Supreme Court are rendered to the clerk of that court in the same manner that this one was presented to us.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This whole discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent. The Chair will include the Senator from South Dakota in that consent.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I simply want to ask the Senator from Colorado a question. I have only glanced at the resolution introduced by the Senator, but I understand it proposes to do away entirely with the furnishing of these advance sheets.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I simply want to express the wish and hope that that may not be done. It is possible that we are paying an exorbitant price for the printing. If that be true, the matter ought to be looked into. But these advance sheets, giving the current decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are a very valuable aid to Senators here. I remember when the decisions were rendered in the Standard Oil case and in the Tobacco case and in some other important cases they immediately became the subject of very great interest and of discussion on the floor of this Chamber.

This is something that is not confined to members of the Judiciary Committee, but applies to every Member, laymen as well as lawyers. I think it would be a mistake for all of them to be unable to get these advance copies for reference, and have them in a convenient form in which one can put them in his pocket and take them to his room or bring them to his office, or bring them to the Chamber. I do not believe it would be in the interest of the business of the Senate to discontinue them. If we are paying too much for them, that is another matter; but I hope it will not be seriously proposed here to cut them out.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator from South Dakota that I have looked at this phase of the question also. We had a decision of the Supreme Court the other day that affected questions arising in our State——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FLETCHER. This resolution has been regularly referred to a committee and it is now before that committee. We are discussing it here, and going into the merits of the whole matter, it seems to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated that this was being done by unanimous consent, no objection having been interposed. Does the Senator from Florida object to the further discussion of the matter?

Mr. SMOOT. I just want to make one further statement. When the Senate was considering the appropriation bill providing money for paying for printing these decisions this very question was decided; and if I had thought for a minute that the discussion would have drifted off in this way, I would have sent for the RECORD showing that discussion. But if the Senator will look it up——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington can not take a Senator off the floor for that purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator wish to change the reference of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. That is all I asked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Utah has yielded the floor?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah understands that the Senator from Washington suggested the absence of a quorum, and that that took him off the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Shields
Bacon	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Borah	Gronna	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Hollis	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Brandegee	James	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Sterling
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Owen	Stone
Catron	Jones	Perkins	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Ransdell	Thornton
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Robinson	Vardaman
Crawford	Lane	Saulsbury	Works
Dillingham	Lea	Shafroth
Fall	Lewis	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

EXTRA CLERK FOR SENIOR SENATOR FROM WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the next resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 106, submitted yesterday by Mr. KENYON, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] be allowed an extra clerk at $1,200 per year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JONES. I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a motion to that effect?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington moves that the resolution just read be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Unless there is objection, such will be the order. The morning business is closed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2258) to extend the proposed reorganization of the customs service for a period of two years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to ask the Senator if there is an immediate necessity for the consideration of this bill and if it can not be postponed for two or three days? It came in yesterday, I understand, on a report from the committee. I do not know, of course, what the report consists of, but it occurred to me that if we could have a short time to examine it it might be more satisfactory. I am aware of the fact that if the bill is to have any value it ought to be passed during the present month, but I ask the Senator whether two or three days, until Monday or whenever we meet again, will make a material difference?

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill was reported yesterday by the committee and the report is printed in the RECORD. I had the report read, and the Senator will find it on page 1898 of the RECORD. It is not a long report. I presumed that even those who were not here when it was read would be familiar with it by this morning.

It seems to me to be important to proceed to the consideration of the measure now, for the reason indicated by the Senator, that unless action is taken during this month it will be too late. The Executive order which was issued March 3 will take effect the 1st of July. I should like to have action of the Senate on the bill to-day, if possible, because it then has to go to the House, and we do not know when the House will be in a position to take it up. We have only this month for final action on the bill by the two Houses.

Then, besides, the department would naturally like to know what arrangement they will be called upon to make in order to carry into execution the present order, unless that order is modified or changed as proposed by the bill.

For those reasons I think it quite important that we should proceed as rapidly as possible with this measure. If a postponement is to take place, as suggested by the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, until January, 1914, six months instead of two years as proposed in the bill which I have introduced and reported, then there is no need to make arrangements for carrying into effect the Executive order already made. If a postponement is not to take place, of course the department would like to know as early as possible, because plans will have to be made for enforcing the order as it now stands.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As I understand the present situation, there will be no difficulty at any time when this matter is up in securing the legislation desired by the department. While it is true, as the Senator says, that the report is in the RECORD this morning, I doubt if many of us have had an opportunity to read it. I hope the Senator will let the bill go over until the next meeting of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to let the bill go over for to-day. I thought I had the report, but I find I have it not. I have sent for it. If the Senator will allow the bill to go over to-day, I would be very grateful.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will agree to that if I can get unanimous consent that the bill will be taken up immediately after the close of the morning business at the next session of the Senate and disposed of during that calendar day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida substitute that request for his motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. FLETCHER. If the bill can now be taken up, I will ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until immediately after the morning business at the next session of the Senate, and that it be then taken up and considered and disposed of during that calendar day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think the Senate should be crowded in the consideration of this measure. So far as I am personally concerned, I believe it can be disposed of at the next meeting of the Senate, but I am not willing to mortgage out the time of the Senate in this way. I therefore object to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES. Before proceeding to this important matter I think we ought to have a quorum. So I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FLETCHER. I believe I have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bacon	Hughes	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	James	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Norris	Smoot
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Oliver	Stephenson
Catron	Jones	Owen	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Perkins	Stone
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Pomerene	Swanson
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Ransdell	Thompson
Crawford	Lane	Robinson	Thornton
Dillingham	Lea	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fletcher	Lewis	Shafroth
Gore	McCumber	Sheppard
Gronna	Martin, Va.	Shields

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has been called from the Chamber to attend a committee meeting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum of the Senate present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2258.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida if he will not agree to let the bill go over one day. I do not think he is going to hasten the matter at all by pressing it to-day. I have not even had time to read the message of the President. I do not know what it contains; I do not know the changes proposed to be made; and I do feel that before we vote upon it I should know.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator from Utah suggest a time when he will have had an opportunity to investigate it?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Virginia, I may have no objection to it at all. I do not know what it is. It came in here yesterday. I have not even seen a printed copy of the report. I have not even read the message of the President. I do feel that the Senator ought to give us a chance at least to do that.

Mr. SWANSON. There seems to be no objection to the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no message from the President to read. The only thing is the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce with regard to the bill, and the whole matter can be very briefly stated. I think in 10 minutes the Senate will understand the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I have here House Document No. 1450, "Reorganization of the customs service. Message from the President of the United States, transmitting plan of reorganization of the customs service and detailed estimate of expenses of the same." I do not see why the Senator should insist that we should take up this bill immediately, without even giving a chance to Senators to see what the proposed reorganization is.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to accommodate the Senator, and I am perfectly willing to do so; but it seems to me I have made a perfectly fair proposition. If the Senate will agree to dispose of the matter at the next session of the Senate, I will be perfectly willing to let the bill go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the Senator from Wyoming objected to that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I objected to the immediate consideration.

Mr. HUGHES. But the Senator from Wyoming does not object to considering it when the Senate meets again.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to agree that at the next session of the Senate—whenever that may be—we shall take up the bill for consideration after the morning business.

Mr. FLETCHER. And dispose of it during that calendar day.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not like to agree that we should get through with the discussion of it. Something might develop that I now know nothing of. I think we can get through with it on that calendar day, perhaps within an hour or two. But I do not think we ought to go to the extent of agreeing that that shall be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that the consideration be concluded on the next legislative day. That will give time enough. It is important to dispose of the bill. I am perfectly willing to be as accommodating about it as possible, but it is a matter that must be disposed of pretty soon or it will be too late to do anything at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing that the Senator on Monday shall make it the unfinished business, or he can make it the unfinished business now. I do not, however, believe that we ought to tie ourselves down to conclude on a given day the consideration of a measure we know nothing about.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator consent to make it the unfinished business and take it up immediately after the close of the morning business at the next session of the Senate and dispose of it during that legislative day?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see why the Senator includes the latter part of his request.

Mr. FLETCHER. Because if it is not disposed of at that time it loses its place.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. If it is not disposed of on that day, it is the unfinished business for the following day. It has exactly the same right, as far as that is concerned, and if the Senate wants to discuss it opportunity will be given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Florida that it can be taken up at this time and be made the unfinished business, and it will remain the unfinished business until disposed of or displaced by the affirmative action of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; that is what I said.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well. I want, of course, to be reasonable about it. If the Senator wishes to examine the bill, I do not want to hurry it unnecessarily. I want to impress upon the Senate the importance of disposing of the measure as early as possible. I am willing to let it stand on that basis, and will modify my motion and move to make it the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the bill become the unfinished business of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I now ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SALARY OF CLERK TO COMMITTEE OF BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 67, increasing the salary of the clerk to the Committee on Banking and Currency to $3,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a resolution which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 67, increasing the salary of the clerk to the Committee on Banking and Currency to $3,000.

Mr. JONES. That is a very important matter, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. OWEN. There has been no intervening business since the Senator last made the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that business has intervened. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Newlands	Shively
Bacon	Hollis	Norris	Simmons
Brady	James	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
Burton	Jones	Owen	Smoot
Catron	Kenyon	Perkins	Stephenson
Chamberlain	Kern	Pomerene	Sterling
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Ransdell	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Robinson	Thornton
Crawford	Lea	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fall	Lewis	Shafroth
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard
Gore	Myers	Shields

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that my motion be put, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 17, being Senate resolution No. 67. [Putting the question.] The motion is agreed to. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 67), as follows:

Resolved, That the clerk to the Committee on Banking and Currency, whose employment was authorized by resolution of March 17, 1913, be paid at the rate of $3,000 per annum from miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JONES. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment to the resolution, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the resolution, the following words:

And all Senators now having less than three employees shall be allowed an additional employee, to be paid at the rate of $1,200 per annum from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair that amendment can not be now entertained. The Revised Statutes provide that hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of the Senate unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The Chair recalls that during the Sixty-second Congress this same motion was made as an amendment to a proposition which came from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, when the then presiding officer, Vice President Sherman, decided, and properly decided, in the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, that no proposition which imposed a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate could be entertained without having first been referred to that committee.

Mr. JONES. I desire to suggest that this matter has been referred to that committee, and has been reported back by the committee to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There may have been a similar proposition referred, but it was not the same. It did not come in the form of an amendment; and, furthermore, it has been reported adversely.

Mr. JONES. It was not reported from the committee in the form of an amendment; that is true.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair rules that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that I did not quite understand what was the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decided that it was not competent to propose an amendment which imposed a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate without the proposition having first been submitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Chair is right in that position, but, as I understand, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] took the position that the matter had already been before the committee. If such is the case, then, of course, it presents another question entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that this particular amendment has been before the committee.

Mr. OWEN. It has not been sanctioned by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. "Sanctioned" means authorization for the payment of the money; it does not mean the consideration of a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair limits the ruling to the fact that this particular amendment was never considered by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The amendment is, therefore, ruled out of order.

Mr. SMOOT. To that I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution which has been read to the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma what necessity is there for the passage of this resolution?

Mr. OWEN. The necessity for its passage is that the Committee on Banking and Currency has a very important task to perform—a duty of vast importance. Its correspondence is extremely large, and the difficulties of that committee are obvious. There are 24 committees that are better supplied with clerical assistance than is that committee. This matter has been reported on by the Committee on Banking and Currency and has further been reported on by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Does not the Senator from Oklahoma think that the committee should hire what additional help it needs?

Mr. OWEN. It does not require additional employees.

Mr. JONES. Then, what is this resolution for?

Mr. OWEN. It is for the clerk of that committee.

Mr. JONES. Is it for the increase of his salary?

Mr. OWEN. It is.

Mr. JONES. Why should not any increase that is necessary be paid by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. OWEN. The chairman might do that, and if it were necessary to do it he would be willing to do it.

Mr. JONES. Why should not the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate require him to do it?

Mr. OWEN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. JONES. I have the floor.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Washington did not have the floor. I had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has forgotten which Senator had the floor.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Chair was putting the question on the adoption of the resolution when I asked for recognition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington is right. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the chairman of the committee, if he desires.

Mr. OWEN. The chairman of the committee has nothing further to say with regard to the matter.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have secured from the Senator the information which I desired. It seems to me that if it were necessary to pay this clerk something additional it probably would be proper to require the opulent Committee on Banking and Currency to pay whatever was necessary in addition to what the Senate has already allowed. It seems to me if some Senators are required to pay out of their own pockets for clerical assistance to discharge the public duties imposed upon them, that other Senators might well do the same thing, and especially when, as I understand, this committee has a clerk who is now receiving $2,500 per annum. Apparently his wages should be raised; but it would seem to me, if we are going to practice the economy of which the Senate seems to be in favor thus far, that wherever an increase is needed by some clerk of a committee the chairman of the committee should pay that increase.

I simply desired to call that situation to the attention of the Senate. I have no doubt that this committee needs this help; I have no doubt that the clerk of this committee is worth his pay, that he ought to have it, and that it ought not to come out of the pocket of the chairman of the committee or of the members of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE TARIFF (S. DOC. NO. 45).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when I asked a few days ago for the printing of Senate Document No. 45, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] requested me to have a note printed and made part of that document. I have that note and also a supplement to Senate Document No. 45, showing the items in all of the schedules that fall in the basket clause under the present law and which are enumerated specifically in the Underwood bill. I ask, Mr. President, that the matter be printed as a supplement to Senate Document No. 45.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Utah will be granted, unless there is objection.

Mr. JONES. I desire to object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMOOT. If morning business is concluded, I call for the regular order, which is the calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. BACON. Unless there is something very special, I desire to move an executive session. There are executive matters of importance that we should dispose of.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason I have called for the regular order is that we have not at this session taken up the calendar; but if the Senator desires an executive session, I will not object.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I guarded what I said. I said if there was anything special I would not make the motion; but in a general way there are important matters which demand immediate attention in executive session; and, therefore, unless there is something very urgent I would insist upon the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is anything very urgent, Mr. President, and therefore I will withdraw my request if the Senator wishes to move an executive session.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on next Tuesday at 2 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. KENYON. I will suggest to the Senator to make it Monday. There are a number of Senators who will be compelled to leave Washington Monday night in connection with the West Virginia investigation, and they have some matters which they would like to bring up on Monday.

Mr. KERN. I should like to accommodate the Senator from Iowa, but the consensus of opinion on this side is that more Senators will be accommodated by adjourning to Tuesday rather than to Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has the right to move to amend the motion of the Senator from Indiana if he sees proper to do so.

Mr. KENYON. If adjourning to Tuesday will accommodate a greater number, I will not object, for I believe in the rule of the greater number.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MYERS. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion made by the Senator from Indiana is that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next at 2 o'clock p. m. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHARD H. WILSON.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 9, being the bill (S. 662) for the relief of Col. Richard H. Wilson, Fourteenth Infantry, United States Army. That is a little bill which has been twice favorably reported by the Military Committee. It passed the Senate unanimously at the last session, and it was pretty fully and satisfactorily explained at that time by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the then Senator from Montana, Mr. Dixon, and a number of others. I ask unanimous consent now to have it put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 662. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, while this bill ought to pass and was reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs when I was a member of that committee, yet I am satisfied that the delay of a short while will not prevent early action in the House, and therefore I will have to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MYERS. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill the objection of the Senator from Washington to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator from Montana will not do that, because I asked for the regular order, which is the calendar under Rule VIII——

Mr. MYERS. Well, I appeal to the Senator from Washington to withdraw the objection. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington what is the objection?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I stated I had no objection to this bill; that it is a meritorious measure; that it was reported favorably from the Military Committee when I was a member of it; and that I favored it——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. JONES. But that a delay of a few days will not prevent early action in the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The debate is out of order. The motion is not debatable. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 662. The question is on that motion.

Mr. JONES. I have the floor, Mr. President, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has the floor now.

Mr. JONES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ASHURST (when his name was called). The country respects this body only in so far as it respects itself. I am here.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the calling of the roll. The following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Norris	Simmons
Bacon	James	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Owen	Smoot
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Stephenson
Catron	Kenyon	Pomerene	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kern	Ransdell	Stone
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Robinson	Swanson
Clarke, Ark.	Lea	Saulsbury	Thompson
Fall	Lewis	Shafroth	Thornton
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Hitchcock	Myers	Shields
Hollis	Newlands	Shively

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. MYERS. Is my motion now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 662.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator from Utah desires to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar, I am willing to withdraw the motion I have made. I have no desire to put this bill ahead of three or four others. I should like to know the status. I will inquire whether the Chair was about to proceed to a call of the calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to put the motion of the Senator from Montana, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 662.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that I have not the least objection to the consideration of this bill. But a few moments before he moved for its consideration I asked that we proceed with the regular order, which was the calendar under Rule VIII. His bill would have been reached in a very few minutes. At the earnest request of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], stating that the Senate had some special business to attend to in executive session, I withdrew that request to proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII in order that the Senator might move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

I will say to the Senator from Montana that, after withdrawing a demand for the regular order, I think it unfair for him now to insist upon taking up a bill that would have been considered under the regular order within a very few minutes indeed. After stating that, Mr. President, the Senate can do as it pleases. I do not think it was a proper proceeding to take, after I had yielded to the request of the Senator from Georgia to withdraw my motion in order that the Senate might proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to disclaim being responsible for the action of the Senator from Utah in withdrawing his motion. I interposed no objection to his motion. If he withdrew it, I supposed he did it of his own free will and accord. I do not believe I have ever before been accused of being unfair or discourteous in this body. If I am to labor the rest of my life under the withering scorn of the Senator from Utah on that account, I will try to travel along and live in some way. I submit my motion and ask that it be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Montana.

The question being put, there were, on a division, ayes 21, noes 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	James	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Smoot
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Stephenson

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. Not a quorum is present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. OWEN, and Mr. SWANSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is absent on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the remainder of the day.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. DILLINGHAM entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The order requiring the Sergeant at Arms to secure the attendance of absentees is vacated from this time forward.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 35 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 10, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 6, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, always present, working in and through the hearts of Thy children, make us tractable to the holy influence that our thoughts and deeds may be in consonance with Thy will that we may advance Thy kingdom upon the earth, have the approving conscience and assurance that the world is a little better that we have lived and wrought after the similitude of the Master, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, June 3, 1913, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LENROOT, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

COMMITTEE RESIGNATION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the resignation of a member from a committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1913.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I desire to tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which honorable position the Committee on Ways and Means has nominated me, and in which nomination the Democratic caucus has concurred.

I made it clear at the Democratic caucus Monday that I would not be able to render good service to the House, the Democratic Party, and the District on that committee. I favor home rule, and I do not feel that I, coming from far-away Colorado, can tell the people of Washington much about how to run their affairs. There are many intricate problems connected with the government of this great city and the administration of its affairs that I have not the time to study as they should be studied by any Member of Congress who accepts this committee assignment.

I am sure there are many Members who would be glad to accept this assignment. The people of Colorado sent me here for other purposes than to study the intricacies of Washington government. For 21 years I have been a specialist on freight rates and general transportation problems. My desire to be assigned to membership on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is well known to you and the House. I desire this assignment because I feel that I can accomplish more for the people who sent me here on that than on any other committee. I feel that it is a grave mistake to spoil a good shoemaker by trying to make a doctor of him. Just so I feel that it would be a mistake for me to serve on a committee for membership on which I have no special qualification, and in so serving to give up hope of serving upon the committee where I feel I can do some good.

Very sincerely, yours,

GEO. J. KINDEL.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Mr. PAGE and Mr. LANE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to have such printing and binding done as may be required for the transaction of its business.

Mr. LOBECK. That is my understanding.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman know?
Mr. LOBECK. I know that we had printing and binding done last year.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman states that they had that authority, I shall not object.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I have sent to the desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required for the transaction of its business, and that said committee and subcommittees thereof shall have authority to sit during the sessions of the House and during the recesses of the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?
Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia just how much printing and binding they can do under this resolution? In view of the fact that I have constant requests for reports of the Pujo investigating committee, can the gentleman tell me whether he can reprint some of those findings under this proposition?
Mr. GLASS. The resolution says "for the business of the committee," and I presume that that means the regular routine business of the committee, such as stationery and printing required in the transaction of the business. Answering the gentleman's question, I would not think that this resolution would cover the proposition that he has suggested.
Mr. MURDOCK. The resolution does not contemplate the printing of any of these reports?
Mr. GLASS. No.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask that the resolution be again reported.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the resolution.
The Clerk again read the resolution.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if this resolution has been offered as the result of any committee action?
Mr. GLASS. No; it has not.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask if the ranking minority member on the Committee on Banking and Currency has been consulted?
Mr. GLASS. He has not. He is out of the city.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it the intention of the Committee on Banking and Currency to have hearings in the near future?
Mr. GLASS. It is not. It would be necessary to have authority for the hearings if they are deemed necessary.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Can the gentleman give us any idea when we can expect a bill on the currency question from this committee?
Mr. GLASS. I can not.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the ranking minority member of the committee, I shall object to the consideration of the resolution.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota objects.

PREVIOUS QUESTION ON NOMINATIONS FOR COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP.

The SPEAKER. On Tuesday last the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a parliamentary inquiry of some importance, to which the circumstances at that particular moment did not necessitate an answer from the Chair, but upon which several prominent Members think the Chair should render an opinion for future guidance, and, it being a new question, the Chair concurs in their suggestion.

The parliamentary inquiry was this:

When the floor leader submits to the House a list of nominations for membership on committees, has he or any other Member the right to move the previous question on the said list of nominations?

After due consideration of the question, the Chair is of the opinion that under such circumstances the motion for the previous question is in order.

It so happened that on this particular occasion the floor leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD] simply moved that the list which he submitted be adopted, but it would have been in order for him to have offered a resolution for the same purpose. Had he offered a resolution, it is clear that he could have moved the previous question; and by analogy, it is equally clear that he could have moved the previous question on his motion. Otherwise we might be placed in the preposterous situation of spending days or even weeks or months in the election of committees. To say that the previous question can not be moved and ordered in such a posture of affairs would be to give the widest possible latitude for filibustering—a practice which the House frowns upon.

Of course, should the majority leader, as the mouthpiece of both the Committee on Ways and Means and of the majority party caucus, abuse the powers of said committee and of said caucus, the House has its remedy by voting down the motion for the previous question, thereby throwing the list of nominations, made by either motion or resolution, open to amendment.

It goes without saying that until the motion for the previous question is agreed to by the House the motion or resolution to adopt the nominations for committee assignments is open to debate or amendment.

It is within the knowledge of all that the uniform practice of the House under the rules is to elect the Clerk of the House and other officers by resolution, and it is also a matter of common knowledge that the general parliamentary practice of conventions throughout the land is to "move to close nominations," which is only another method of "moving the previous question," the two motions having precisely the same effect.

RECEIVERSHIP OF "FRISCO" RAILROAD SYSTEM.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would inquire upon what subject?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I will state, in answer to the gentleman's question, that on the 2d of June I introduced a resolution in the House directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate the recent receivership of the Frisco Railroad system, and the remarks I desire to insert in the RECORD are facts which I have dug out with reference to the matter.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, on the 2d day of June I introduced the following resolution:

House resolution 116.

Whereas the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad system, on the application of Charles Nagel, former Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and Frederick W. Lehmann, former Solicitor General of the United States, was placed in the hands of a receiver because of its alleged inability to take up its issue of two-year 5 per cent notes, due June 1, for the sum of $2,250,000; and

Whereas the total authorized stock of said railroad system is $200,000,000; and

Whereas its total stock outstanding is $49,993,262; and

Whereas its total amount of bonds is $320,312,443; and

Whereas the gross earnings of said railroad system for the years 1911 and 1912 were $42,100,364; and

Whereas the net earnings for said years were only $12,992,518; and

Whereas the said receivership has caused many charges of mismanagement to be made in relation to watering the company's securities and many other abuses in the management of said railroad system; and

Whereas approximately $26,000,000 worth of the bonds of said company have been sold in Paris: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate fully all the facts concerning this receivership, and also the management of said company for a period of one year prior to said receivership, and report all such facts to Congress.

On the 28th of May, 1913, the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. was placed in the hands of a receiver on the application of Charles Nagel, former Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and Frederick W. Lehmann, former Solicitor General of the United States. The reason urged for the appointment of a receiver was the inability or refusal of the said company to pay its issue of two-year 5 per cent notes, due June 1, for the sum of $2,250,000. This railroad system has a total authorized capital stock of $200,000,000, of which $49,993,262 is now outstanding. The company has also issued bonds to the amount of $320,312,443.

The gross earnings of the railroad for the years 1911-12 amounted to $42,100,364, while the net earnings for the same period were only $12,992,518.

Of the bonds outstanding belonging to the company, about $26,000,000 worth were sold in Paris. Three million were sold in Paris within 10 days of the receivership. In 1900 the total mileage of the Frisco system was 1,402, since which time Mr. B. F. Yokum, manager of the system, with practically absolute power, has acquired and made a part of the Frisco system the following lines:

The St. Louis & Missouri Railroad, with 543 miles.
The Springfield Missouri to Kansas City, 185 miles.
Monett, Mo., to Red River, 286 miles.
Oklahoma City to Red River, 175 miles.
Sapulpa, Okla., to Denison, Tex., 193 miles.
Pierce City, Mo., to Ellsworth, Kans., 324 miles.
Hope, Ark., to Ardmore, Okla., 224 miles.
Beaumont, Kans., to Red River, 318 miles.
Fayetteville, Ark., to Okmulgee, Okla., 144 miles.
Tulsa, Okla., to Ardmore, Okla., 175 miles.
Branches, 975 miles.
Trackage to Kansas City, 4 miles.
Carrolton-Irving, cut-off 11 miles.
The following lines were leased and controlled by stock:
Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis, 919 miles.
Kansas City, Memphis & Birmingham, 286 miles.
The following lines are operated independently:
Fort Worth and Rio Grande, 235 miles.

Paris & Great Northern, 17 miles.
New Orleans, Texas & Mexico, 277 miles.
Beaumont, Sour Lake & Western, 118 miles.
Orange & North Western, 61 miles.
St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico, 510 miles.
Rio Grande, 22 miles.
St. Louis, San Francisco & Texas, 243 miles.

Chicago & Eastern Illinois, 1,275 miles. Total mileage, including 520 miles trackage, 7,520 miles. The company also controls the Birmingham Belt Railroad, 40 miles.

Under the management of Mr. Yokum, in August, 1902, the St. Louis & San Francisco Co. acquired the greater part of the stock of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, and in 1911 merged the Evansville & Terre Haute Co. with the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, which he previously controlled. The Chicago & Eastern Illinois at the time it was acquired owned $1,000,000 of the stock of the Chicago & Western Indiana Railroad Co.

The Frisco system operated the Chicago & Eastern Illinois independently, together with all its 22 branch lines, 1,275 miles, 177 miles of which is double track.

The common stock outstanding of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois at the time it was acquired by the Frisco system was $7,217,800 (or $15,000 per mile).

The preferred stock amounted to $8,830,700.

In addition to all this, $6,408,300 worth of common stock was held in trust by the Trust Company of America till July, 1912, as a part of "trust assets," by agreement made dated July, 1905, for improvements, acquisitions, or refunding, to be terminated on satisfaction of the St. Louis & San Francisco trust agreements. (See vol. 85, p. 1001.)

HISTORY.

The St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad was organized September 10, 1876, reorganized June 29, 1896, under the laws of Missouri.

In December, 1909, certain interests purchased from the Rock Island $28,940,300 of the $29,000,000 of common stock acquired in 1903; but the St. Louis & San Francisco and its controlled lines are now operated independent of the Rock Island lines.

The Frisco system owns all the capital stock of its leased and auxiliary companies and more than 83½ per cent of the outstanding capital stock of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad Co.

The Frisco system, together with the Southern Railroad, owns all the stock of the New Orleans Terminal Co., each one-half, and they jointly guarantee $14,000,000 first mortgage 4 per cent 50-year gold bonds.

Again, on July 19, 1907, the Frisco system acquired the St. Louis, Memphis & Southeastern Railroad Co.

On July 15, 1907, the Blackwell, Enid & Southwestern Railroad Co.

On July 20, 1907, the Ozark & Cherokee Central Railroad.

On July 19, 1907, the Arkansas Valley & Western Railroad.

On July 17, 1907, the Fort Sill & Van Buren Bridge Co.

On July 18, 1907, the Oklahoma City & Western Railroad, and on the same date they also acquired the Sulphur Springs Railroad. (See Poor's Manual, p. 1175.)

OPERATING RESULTS.

The total operating expenses for the year 1911 was $29,320,400 and the net earnings $13,838,828. The net miscellaneous income for that year was $2,333,971, making a total net income for that year of $16,172,779.

The authorized capital stock of the Frisco Co. was $5,000,000 first preferred, $31,000,000 second preferred, and $164,000,000 common stock, making a total of $200,000,000.

The outstanding stock consisted of $5,000,000 first preferred, $16,000,000 second preferred, and $29,000,000 common, a total of $50,000,000 of outstanding stock.

Its treasury stock is made up as follows: $6,535.10 first preferred, $53 second preferred, and $149.60 common, making a total of $6,737.70, the par value of the shares being $100.

The preferred stock, in the order of preference, is entitled to noncumulative dividends at the rate of 4 per cent per annum in priority to common stock. It is provided that no further mortgage shall be placed upon the property nor the amount of the preferred stock be increased, except with the consent, in either instance, of the holders of a majority of each class of preferred stock given at a meeting called for the purpose, and of such part of common stock as shall be represented at the meeting. The St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. owns all the capital stock of the Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis Railroad and all the stock of the auxiliary companies. The capital stock of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. therefore may be said to represent the ownership of the entire system.

This resolution should be passed, Mr. Speaker, and an investigation made if for no other reason than this receivership had already been given as a reason why freight rates should be raised. As usual the public is asked to hold the bag and pay the fiddler when the operations of these gentlemen who are given to frenzied finance are brought to a halt. Many persons who have purchased the $72,000,000 of the securities which this company has sold during the last three years are anxious to know now what portion of this money found its way into the treasury of the company and how much was diverted into the pockets of certain officials. It is claimed that of the $26,000,000 of the Frisco bonds sold in France approximately $20,000,000 worth were sold in denominations of $100 to about 250,000 persons, who are people of small means for the most part and scattered all over France. This transaction is bound to result in great loss to legitimate American securities in France and other foreign countries where American paper finds a market, unless the receivership is probed to the bottom by the United States Government. I am more than satisfied that a thorough investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission will demonstrate that the Frisco system under the management of B. F. Yokum has never been conducted as a legitimate transportation company, but that it has been made the basis of a tremendous jobbing scheme to enrich the men who have been in a position to manipulate its securities. I believe it will also be found that great volumes of the stocks and bonds of this company have been sold far in excess of the true value of the tangible property owned by the company. The effect of this receivership on American securities in France is fittingly described by the Paris Journal des Debats, which says:

AMERICAN FINANCIAL MORALS.

American financial morals make operations in securities depending upon New York particularly dangerous. American bankers, in fact, have the idea, which is accepted as perfectly legitimate there, that ability only counts in business. We must believe that the evidence of these proceedings makes American securities undesirable in France. Speculative securities are in the hands of unscrupulous manipulators, who will never hesitate to fleece our market.

As for investment securities, some of the first order exist in the United States, but the profit on those of this category does not leave enough margin to allow them to be quoted in Paris. Our fiscal organization, at any rate, is opposed to it, for it acts as a filter which lets pass only those securities which somebody has special interest to place with us.

Mr. Speaker, it is just such transactions as these that have created an insistent public demand for legislation limiting the issuance of stocks and bonds and other obligations by great transportation companies, and I am personally of the opinion that the time is ripe for Government supervision of the capitalization of these great corporations engaged in interstate commerce.

It must be apparent to every thinking person that when a railroad company issues bonds for the purpose of raising money and that money is used for purposes other than that of increasing the value of the railroad property or the efficiency of transportation, the patrons of the road who pay the freight are being unjustly taxed and robbed to meet such obligations. As an evidence that even the great lawyers who believe in State sovereignty admit the power of the Federal Government to regulate and supervise the capitalization of railroad companies, I quoted from that eminent lawyer, Judson Clements, one of the most able members of the present Interstate Commerce Commission:

It has been suggested that the Federal Government has no constitutional authority to regulate the issuance of stocks and obligations by corporations chartered not by it but by State governments. The clause in the Constitution of the United States empowering Congress to regulate commerce among the States is absolute, unqualified, and unconditional. The power was conferred upon the Federal Government to be exercised for the good of all for the sufficient reason that it was soon found by the colonies to be a matter that should be regulated by one authority and not by many sovereigns, and this for similar reasons to those which prompted the conferring upon the Federal Government of the power to impose tariff duties, etc. One State in the Union under a lax system of granting charters and charter privileges could paralyze the efforts of all the other States to regulate these matters. There is no more sacred right of the States than that of having the Federal Government adequately do those things for which it was created, of which one of the most important is to regulate interstate commerce affecting directly, as it does, every interest and person throughout the Republic.

There can be no question of the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make this investigation in accordance with this resolution.

Personally, I believe the commission has ample power to proceed with this investigation without a resolution from Congress and purely on its own initiative.

I indulge the hope, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution may pass by unanimous consent.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF MEDICINE.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 93, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 93.

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the British Government to the Government of the United States to participate by delegates in an International Congress of Medicine to be held in London in the year 1913: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with the said conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman make a statement of what this proposition is.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the resolution authorizes the President to accept the invitation of the British foreign office to send delegates from this country to attend a medical conference in London, beginning on the 6th day of August and ending on the 13th of August.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any particular necessity for adopting this resolution at this time?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Yes; because we have put in one of our appropriation bills an inhibition against accepting an invitation of this kind unless it is approved by Congress, and this invitation ought to be accepted at once, because this convention takes place in August, and they are arranging now for it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In the opinion of the gentleman, is it not likely that subsequently an appropriation will be asked to pay the expenses in connection with the commission that may be appointed?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Oh, I think not. All the funds for the expenses of the delegates of this country have been arranged for, and if an appropriation is asked it will not be granted.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Has this resolution had consideration by the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. It was considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs last Wednesday and unanimously reported.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if this resolution comes within the prohibition, I believe, put upon what measures shall be reported to the House by the Democratic caucus?

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The Democratic caucus gave unanimous consent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report this resolution.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think, Mr. Speaker, for the present I shall object to the consideration of the resolution—however, I withhold the objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from South Dakota that this invitation was extended to the Government by Mr. Bryce, late ambassador here, on the 12th of January, and the President has been unable to accept the invitation owing to the inhibition in one of our appropriation bills. It is necessary for the medical associations of this country to get their delegates together and prepare to attend the congress, and for that reason I thought it would be well to have it passed at this time. The congress takes place in August, and every country has accepted the invitation to that congress except the United States, and it is at my request that the committee considered this resolution immediately because I wanted to put those gentlemen in a position to accept the invitation and attend the congress. There is no appropriation. No appropriation is asked now, indeed it is specially provided there shall be no appropriation, and none will be asked in the future.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows that has been in resolutions heretofore and it did not operate as a bar to the parties interested coming here and asking for an appropriation, and I think the gentleman believes that there will be an appropriation asked for sometime in the future in connection with this matter.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say to the gentleman I know there will be no appropriation asked. Among these gentlemen is the chairman of the executive committee, a personal friend of mine, one of the professors of the Johns Hopkins College in Baltimore, who assures me there will be no appropriation. These gentlemen are all provided with money to go and attend this congress.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minority leader, for the present I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

COMMITTEE ON ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 155.

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads be, and the same is hereby, authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the use of the committee during the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what committee is making the request?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Roads. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 121.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the discharge of the work of said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to know whether or not this committee had the authority in the last Congress asked for in this resolution?

Mr. PEPPER. It had.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 156.

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required for the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONGRESS AND AERONAUTICS.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] asks leave to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] if it has anything to do with a spelling school or a spelling match? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, there is general interest in the country on the subject of the possible use of various forms of air craft, both in peace and in war. The most illuminating contribution that has been made to the literature of that subject recently is an article by my colleague from Ohio, the Hon. WILLIAM GRAVES SHARP, from the fourteenth Ohio district. It is an article which appears in the June number of Aircraft on the subject of "Congress and Aeronautics," and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing this article.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the article named. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the article referred to:

[From the Aircraft, New York, June, 1913.]

"CONGRESS AND AERONAUTICS.

"(By WILLIAM G. SHARP, M. C.)

"Perhaps the old adage that 'necessity is the mother of invention' could not be better exemplified than as it applies to the backwardness of Congress in encouraging aeronautical development by making liberal appropriations therefor. While comparisons in the matter of appropriations for this object with the European countries are highly interesting and illuminating to the average Congressman, yet as long as the imminency of this actual need appears to be so remote, the tendency is for him to act slowly. Living in a country which fortunately is at peace with the world, having been involved in but two foreign wars during a century, with broad oceans on either side of its domain, without the embarrassment of entangling alliances with other powers and no immediate prospect thereof, it is not strange that the American people are less moved by the fear of war and an appeal to the need of national defense than their less fortunate brothers in other lands. This sentiment is reflected in no small degree by the attitude of Congress not alone in the development of the narrower field of aviation, but in the appropriations for both the Army and Navy. Without denying the fact that there is a very strong sentiment in Congress in favor of providing a greater national defense, particularly as it applies to the Navy, yet it is nevertheless true that there is no 'war talk' heard within its Halls. Even during the most critical conditions growing out of the recent revolution in Mexico, with daily stories of depredations being committed on our borders involving the rights of protection to American citizens, those in favor of 'crossing the line' were very few. The sentiment in and out of Congress is in favor of maintaining peaceful relations with all the other peoples of the world. This feeling is epitomized in the remarks of Secretary of State William J. Bryan in an address at the recent banquet of the Navy League of the United States in the city of Washington, when he said in reply to the call for more battleships: 'While you work hard for more battleships, I shall work hard for the next four years to keep you from needing more battleships.'

"These observations have been made by way of preface to account in part for the reason why Congress has not been more responsive to the calls to meet an exigency which the Governments of all Europe have so signally recognized.

"Early in March of last year, with the view of getting before Congress in a concrete form not only what our own and other Governments had accomplished in the development of aviation, but quite as much with the desire to ascertain the attitude of the War Department for its encouragement, the writer introduced the following resolution (H. Res. 448), which was promptly reported out and favorably acted upon by the House:

"RESOLUTION.

"Resolved, That the great importance and necessity of a practical knowledge of aviation as it relates to warfare being now generally admitted by all civilized nations, some of which are spending large sums of money in equipping their armies with various kinds of air craft as a means both of attack and of transport, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to send to the House of Representatives full information upon the following points:

"First. The results of his investigations and the transmission of any reports made by our official agents in foreign countries as to the development and value of aerial navigation, either for the purpose of warfare or to encourage scientific research.

"Second. The extent and cost of our Government's equipment in aeroplanes or other air craft now being used in any capacity by the War Department, and the nature of the instruction in aeronautics which is being given to its Army officers and enlisted men.

"Third. The plans now contemplated by the War Department for increasing the present equipment of aeroplanes, hydroaeroplanes, and other air craft for the purposes of warfare and national defense, together with recommendations for such legislation as will adequately provide for such service with reference both to increasing the number of Army officers of the Signal Corps who may be detailed for aviation service as well as the establishment of additional schools of instruction and the building up of our air fleet commensurate with the necessity of properly maintaining our military status among the nations of the world.

"The report of the Secretary of War in transmitting such information (contained in H. Doc. No. 718, 62d Cong., 2d sess.) was not only fully responsive, covering all the points involved in the resolution, but furnished in a most logical and attractive manner many facts of much interest. That part of the report which briefly outlines the plans contemplated by the War Department for increasing the efficiency of this particular branch of the service is especially interesting. For the excellent manner in which the report was compiled much credit is due to Gen. James Allen, former Chief Signal Officer of the Army, whose work in the field of aviation has been notable. It goes without saying that of the 80 pages of that report but 7 or 8 were devoted exclusively to the development of aviation in the United States, yet our rank in this field compared to other nations is still relatively much less. Indeed, so much has been said and written about this disparity that space will not be taken here for statistics, comparative tables, etc. We are more concerned in what is to be done in the future than what has not been done in the past.

"As an appeal to one's patriotism in defense of his country has always met with the more enthusiastic response, whether it be for the sacrifice of life or in the payment of large contributions for war, so naturally the fostering and encouraging of this new field of enterprise by which man has come to navigate the air has met with its greatest encouragement abroad, as it is considered a means of warfare. It is equally true, but unfortunate, that almost the entire consideration of this subject in America has been given as it has to do with its military aspect. And this in the face of the protest of an international peace congress putting a ban upon the use of air craft in warfare even before its very destructive powers could have been more than guessed at! However, the movement which has gone forward so rapidly in Europe, by which vast sums of money have been appropriated for increasing the strength of this new arm for military operations both for attack and defense, is being reflected, though with much less ambition, in the United States. Nearly all of the measures which have been introduced in Congress having to do with this subject—and they are not many at the most—involve the betterment of our aviation service either as it may apply to the Army or the Navy. Few, if any, appropriations have been asked for in these various bills, except as they concern their application to some military service. They have mainly concerned increasing the size of the Signal Corps, to which aviation duty in the Army has thus far been confined; better recognition of those who engage in this service, either by increase in pay or rank; for the establishment of aviation schools in which the art of navigating the air may be taught, etc. It is undeniably true that the importance of the whole subject has seemingly been slow to dawn upon Congress. Even the practical use of air craft, whether of the aeroplane type or the lighter-than-air ship in the recent European wars, has not measurably stirred its enthusiasm for a more liberal policy in making appropriations for its development. And yet there is no one who has kept pace with the rapid development of these machines which navigate the air—especially of the larger Zeppelin type, which are capable of carrying through space at 50 miles an hour a load equal to that of our average freight car, which load may consist equally as well of bombs containing high explosives and rapid-firing guns as innocent merchandise or passengers—but who has come to firmly believe that future wars are to be decided by battles in the air. While this belief is not by any means inconsistent with the need of strong navies, yet it does contain much of portent to their limitation of usefulness and efficiency, judged by the past methods of naval warfare. While time alone will demonstrate the relative merits of the aeroplane or the more bulky type of the huge lighter-than-air ship—though it would seem that both are to have advantages in special fields of military operations—yet from the very nature of the case no nation will henceforth be prepared to go to war, no matter how great its navy, without its complement of aerial craft. The possibilities of their usefulness in ways rendered impossible by any heretofore known method of attack or defense are so patent as to need no enumeration. Should any one of the great European powers which have made such rapid progress in the development of aviation engage in warfare, the world would be startled with the terrible destructive execution of this modern means of attack. Literally nothing would be immune from the visitation of their effective work, whether it be in photographing to the minutest detail every feature of the enemy's defenses or of hurling deadly projectiles for their destruction. Whether it be a strongly garrisoned fort on land or a mighty battleship at sea, neither could escape their attack. Indeed, heroic as the remedy may be, it is doubtful whether any other agency would be so effective in bringing about a century's disarmament of the powers and its accompanying universal peace as the awful destruction of such a war so conducted.

"But happily there is a far nobler field for exploiting this wonderful science of navigating the air. It may serve alike the most utilitarian purpose, as well as furnish the means for advancing scientific research. In the former use a hundred limitations which have hampered man in the problems of transportation may be avoided, while in the latter field it would be unwise to fix a limit to the undiscovered truths which the scientist may learn. It is indeed along the lines of furnishing transportation—and that whether for passengers, merchandise, or the mail—that Congress may be of great aid in advancing the development of aviation. At a time in our economic development, when not only expeditious delivery is a factor, but more especially a cheapened cost of distribution between producer and consumer is greatly sought after, the potential benefits of such a method of transportation become of prime importance. Almost the sole object of the increased agitation of the good-roads movement, now so earnestly claiming the attention of both National and State legislators and involving the expenditure of many millions of dollars, is to bring about this economy.

"Shall not the free air above furnish the commercial highways of the future? Unfortunately, though, to America lies the credit of first actually establishing the possibility of navigating the air, both by aeroplane and the hydroaeroplane, yet the credit of the extent to which it has been developed has been transferred across the water, and to France and Germany indisputably belong very many of the achievements in this work. To the more mercurial Frenchman aviation has become almost a fad, and adding to its exhilaration the promise of supremacy in warfare the whole populace has become enthusiastic on the subject. To the more practical American the aeroplane in particular has been looked upon more as a kite, and the paid exhibitions of the aviators have so often been attended with fatal results that no little amount of skepticism prevails as to its practical utility. The report of the distinguished men whom ex-President Taft appointed to consider the establishment of a national aerodynamical laboratory should awaken much interest. That their recommendation will have much weight with Congress there is no doubt. The urgent need of supplying the element of safety to our various types of aerial machines has been recognized from the first; and indeed its lack has done more to retard the development of the science in this country than any other cause. Manifestly, aside from the influence that such lack of perfection may have upon the unwillingness of Congress to encourage the work in a practical way, this element of danger constantly stands in the way of its gaining popularity. There is to-day no greater need in the development of the navigation of the air than the establishment of such an institution as a laboratory, in which all the meteorological problems, as well as the more purely dynamical and mechanical, may be worked out. Once a principle is evolved by which more stability can be attained with its consequent lessening in the risk by accident, the development of the various types of air craft will go forward as rapidly as the improvements in the automobiles. The prestige that comes from 'nothing succeeds like success' will impress itself quite as much upon Congress as upon the country at large, and as applied to this whole subject of a better recognition of the work of aviation such encouragement will take the form of more liberal appropriations for every purpose for which it may be useful to man and with which activity the Government has to do. In that day legislation affecting its interests will take cognizance of it in the same manner, as far as applicable, as it now does of all the existing methods of transportation, convenience of passengers, safety appliances, carrying of mails, regulations as to rights of way, speed limits, license of aviators, competition of rates, use in war, etc. Then, too, will the scientists be enabled to mount the heights heretofore unattainable, and even without the inconvenience of taking time to alight send by wireless communication their latest reports as to meteorological conditions. They will also be able to announce important discoveries of new properties of solar energy and the medium of that energy, the all-pervading ether."

SPANISH WAR MEMORIAL EXERCISES.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief but eloquent address of Congressman SINNOTT at the Spanish War memorial exercises in Arlington Cemetery on last Decoration Day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the address referred to:

[Remarks of Hon. N. J. SINNOTT, of Oregon, Spanish War memorial exercises, Arlington Cemetery, Washington, D. C., May 30, 1913.]

"A sad, sweet duty summons us here to-day. Sad because it is man's nature to mourn the departed. Sweet because the patriot dead before us evoke memories of a most happy epoch in our Nation's history. They recall an epoch in which we saw the sons of the Southland and the sons of the Northland marching shoulder to shoulder under one flag, oblivious of the past, except as they were equally inspired in their devotion and loyalty to the Stars and Stripes, inspired as they had a right to be by the sacred memories of their sire's heroism, whether displayed under the banner of Grant or Lee.

"The Spanish-American War, with all the burdens and responsibilities it imposed upon us, was not without its rich recompense even though it left many a vacant chair. It swept from the Western Hemisphere the last remnant of Old World tyranny and oppression. It gave us the superb story of Dewey in Manila Bay; it gave us the thrilling tale of Schley at Santiago. Only last week a Nation-wide and successful protest against her proposed desecration recalled the historic cruise of the Oregon. It gave us the proud memories of San Juan Hill and Malabon. But above all the richest and most glorious heritage of this war lies in the fact that it bequeathed these priceless memories to be shared in common by the North and South.

"To-day in other portions of this beautiful Arlington Cemetery tender, loving hands are gently bedecking with choicest flowers the graves of those who, hearing the call of duty to preserve the Union, donned the blue. In still other parts of the cemetery loving hands are fondly spreading the garlands o'er the graves of those who, hearkening to the call of home and State, donned the gray. Here where their sons lie under the sod together the 'better angels' of our nature bid us banish invidious comparisons as to their motives in that fratricidal struggle. We can only regret that the imperishable renown of their valor and fortitude on American soil was not won in a common cause. We can only contemplate in sorrow that their separate sepulchers are sad reminders of a once dissevered country.

"But here in this plot dedicated and consecrated as a common shrine for American patriotism, here among the graves hallowed by the heroes of a common cause, no such thoughts disturb or grieve us. On these tombs we all may proudly, fondly, and tenderly strew our floral tributes. For lying before us in commingled graves sleep side by side the choicest offerings of the Northland and the Southland.

"Here sleep the brave who sank to rest
By all their country's wishes blest."

"Here rest an entire Nation's patriot sons, pledges for the future. Their mingled blood has washed away every vestige of sectional hatred, rancor, and division—every doubt of the oneness and solidarity of our country.

"It was indeed a happy dispensation of an all-wise and just Providence which vouchsafed to us the War with Spain. It came when the sons of the veterans who wore the blue and the gray had reached manhood's prime and vigor. It enabled them together to dispel all suspicions or misgivings as to our complete unity and lasting reconciliation. In their mutual devotion, sacrifice, and heroism under the Stars and Stripes they made real the poet's vision, the vision which beheld:

"Our grand old ship Union's voyage o'er,
At anchorage safe she swings;
And loud and clear, with cheer on cheer,
The joyous welkin rings.
Hurrah! Hurrah! It shakes the wave;
It thunders o'er the land;
One heart, one hand, one flag,
One nation evermore."

PRINTING FOR THE COMMITTEE ON THE CENSUS.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 157.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Census be, and it is hereby, authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, just before adjournment on Tuesday last I announced that I would to-day ask unanimous consent to address the House. I have found it impossible to secure certain data that I desired to use, and therefore I shall not to-day ask for the privilege of addressing the House, but will make the request on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman making his request now or just announcing that he is going to make it?

Mr. MONDELL. If it is proper to make the request now, I shall be glad to make it now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think of anything that will come up on Tuesday, but I think it would be better order to wait until Tuesday, because I do not know what will come up.

Mr. MONDELL. I think so, too, and in the absence of objection then, I shall ask unanimous consent to address the House for an hour on Tuesday.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD certain newspaper clippings and letters that I have.

Mr. BARTLETT. What about?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting certain newspaper clippings and also some letters. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BARTLETT. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of inquiring of the gentleman what subject it covers. While I have full confidence in the gentleman, yet sometimes I know that the privilege has been abused by indiscriminately granting leave to print letters and clippings.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman's inquiry is very proper. One of the clippings is taken from the Washington Post, a reprint from the Seattle Times, headed "A victory for conservation—After 10 years' fight opponents of Pinchot policy die"; and the other clipping that I have is from the Northern Idaho News.

Mr. BARTLETT. On what subject?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. On the same subject. It is in answer to a circular letter that had been sent out by the National Conservation Association to a selected list. It seems that this one particular letter got outside of the selected list, and this is a reply to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what the letter is about?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The letter is an answer to the one sent out by the National Conservation Association—the circular letter that had been sent to various people in regard to the conduct of the national forests, consisting of 10 questions. The gentleman from Kansas is undoubtedly familiar with it. I have had a copy of it myself for the last two weeks.

Mr. MURDOCK. Who wrote that letter?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is signed by Mr. Gifford Pinchot, and it is written on the letterhead of the National Conservation Congress. This is in answer to that letter, in which he wishes to know how the Forest Service is conducted.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman proposes to publish the letter itself along with the other document?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The other one is a letter that I have received from C. W. H. Heideman, of Bonners Ferry, Idaho, in regard to the same subject, in which he expresses great anxiety to have the Forest Service investigated, and says he will furnish evidence if he is called upon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The documents referred to are as follows:

BONNERS FERRY, IDAHO, June 2, 1913.

Hon. Mr. HUMPHREY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I notice with much pleasure that you have just introduced in Congress a resolution calling for an investigation of the Forest Service. I am sorry you do not go further and investigate all phases of the operation of the Forest Service, because I am sure if such an investigation were made it would uncover conditions and methods so rotten as to cause the world to blush for shame.

The evidence to convict them is not lacking, but it seems impossible to get charges considered by the higher-ups. Only a few months ago a high forest official—no less a person than a chief of the operating division of the Forest Service—deliberately tried to bribe me with an offer that would land an ordinary citizen of your State in the pen. To prefer charges against him to the Forest Service would only result in a waste of postage.

I inclose herewith copy of some correspondence. I can make good every statement I make.

Yours, very truly, C. W. H. HEIDEMAN.

[From the Northern Idaho News, Sandpoint, Tuesday, Nov. 12, 1912.]

FOREST SERVICE UNDER FIRE—PINCHOT EXPECTS IT WILL BE VIGOROUSLY ATTACKED AT COMING SESSION OF CONGRESS—HEIDEMAN'S WARM LETTER—PINCHOT REQUESTS "PLAIN AND STRAIGHT OPINION" AND GETS IT—NOT LIKELY, HOWEVER, THAT NATIONAL CONSERVATION ASSOCIATION WILL USE IT.

In anticipation of a vigorous attack on the Forest Service President Gifford Pinchot, of the National Conservation Association, is gathering opinions for use when the fight opens. One of his letters was sent to C. W. H. Heideman, of Bonners Ferry, and Mr. Heideman gives him an opinion which will probably not be used by the Conservation Association. Following are copies of both letters:

Mr. C. W. H. HEIDEMAN,
Bonners Ferry, Idaho.

DEAR SIR: Every year since it was established the Forest Service has been vigorously attacked in Congress. During the past session the attack was renewed, and definite statements were made that a strong effort will be made next winter to cripple the service and break up the national forests. In these attacks it is charged that the Forest Service does its work badly, that its regulations and methods are tyrannical and inefficient, and that the people of the West are overwhelmingly opposed to the whole national-forest system. Whether these charges are true or whether they are merely part of an effort to open the national forests to exploitation by the special interests, they are important. In either case the actual facts ought to be known.

Some of the charges against the national forests are the following:

1. That a national forest is a detriment to the people who live in its neighborhood.
2. That all kinds of natural resources within the national forests are withheld from use.
3. That prospecting is not allowed.
4. That valid mining claims are held up.
5. That the national forests are run so as to favor the big man and not to help the home builder.
6. That homesteads are being taken away from settlers for ranger stations.
7. That the forest officers are overbearing, opposed to the settler, and anxious to keep the country a wilderness by reporting against all claims, whether good or bad.
8. That the forest officers are incompetent eastern theorists, who know nothng about the West.
9. That timber sales are handled in the interest of monopoly for the Lumber Trust.
10. That cattle and sheep barons are given preference over settlers and small owners in range allotments.

The question whether the national forests shall continue to be administered by the National Government or shall be turned over to the States will surely be brought up at the next session of Congress, and the outcome will probably depend upon whether it is shown that the Forest Service is actually administering the national forests efficiently and honestly in the interest of all the people of the West or that it is not.

Your name has been given to me as a representative citizen and a user of one of the national forests. Would you be willing to give me your plain and straight opinion on each of the charges mentioned above? I am anxious to know also what effect the national forests as now handled have upon your own welfare and that of your neighbors. I hope you will make your letter full and explicit, answering by numbers if more convenient. Please do not confine your answer, however, to the numbered charges if there are other matters which deserve consideration. I should be especially glad if your neighbors who agree with the statements made in your letter would sign it with you.

Sincerely, yours,

GIFFORD PINCHOT.

MR. HEIDEMAN'S LETTER.

BONNERS FERRY, IDAHO, October 17, 1912.

Hon. GIFFORD PINCHOT,
President National Conservation Association,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your letter of October 5 in regard to certain charges against the Forest Service is received. I have read the letter very carefully, and gladly avail myself of the opportunity of writing to you my views on the subject.

First, let me say I am an American citizen. I have been a soldier in two branches of the United States Army. I am an applicant for a homestead in the Pend d'Oreille National Forest, in this State. Judging from the persistent hounding and persecution I have been subjected to since my application was filed, I assume I am classed with those termed "special interests" or "land-grabbers." I have given up all hope, however, of ever obtaining a title to the land I desire, so I am not afraid to tell the plain truth.

I am prepared to prove every statement I make in this letter.

Charge No. 1: I do not believe that the people of the West, especially those living near the various national forests, hold the views as stated. I have talked with hundreds of people, and the complaints are against the administration of the Forest Service and the policies now in force of overriding and nullifying the laws of Congress.

Charge No. 2: There may be exceptions, but the charge generally is true. To unwind the red tape surrounding the free-use permit costs more than the supposed gift. I will cite one case, that can be verified from the records of the Forest Service: On October 30, 1911, I applied for 1,435 linear feet of logs for a cabin for myself (surely not extravagant). I waited for the designation of the trees until the permit expired. Nearly a year has passed, the Forest Service claims credit for having given me $14.35 worth of timber free, and yet at no time since the application was made could I cut a tree without danger of prosecution. The so-called free-use permit is a fraud. If the Use Book were published by a corporation it would be barred from the United States mails under a fraud order by the Post Office Department.

Charges Nos. 3 and 4: I have no evidence on the subject, but I do not doubt the truth of the charges.

Charge No. 5: Absolutely true and can be proven. Procure from the records a copy of my letter, dated December 7, 1911, to Acting Forest Supervisor C. F. Howell, Sandpoint, Idaho.

Charge No. 6: Absolutely true; can be proven from the records. Furthermore, the Forest Service robs intending settlers for the benefit of the Northern Pacific Railway.

Charge No. 7: The half has not been charged. I can prove that the charge is true.

Charge No. 8: The charge is true as to incompetency. An incompetent man from the East is no worse than an incompetent western man.

Charge No. 9. I am not in the confidence of the Lumber Trust, so can not say. For some light on the subject that will startle you, I suggest you procure from the records copy of my letter to Mr. J. E. Barton, forest supervisor, Sandpoint, Idaho, dated December 12, 1911, in which I make application to purchase the timber on a certain homestead unit. Also procure a copy of Mr. Barton's reply to me dated December 14, 1911. Permit me to quote two extracts from that letter: "The timber on the area, etc., will be sold to you if you so desire, etc.," and "It is not possible for you to purchase the timber and let the timber stand indefinitely," etc.

(NEWSPAPER CLIPPING): "Mert Hubble has taken a large contract to saw timbers for the S. I. and C. P. railways and has established his mill and camp at Addie, Idaho. Mr. Hubble has about 25 men employed and will probably be there two or more years."

These are neighbors of mine on the same national forest.

The Government would and did sell timber to the Canadian Pacific Railway, who shipped it to Canada, but the Government would not sell me the timber on the land for which I was a preference applicant and let me keep the timber, and yet John D. Jones, acting assistant district forester, under date of November 18, 1911, informs me that the land had been examined and was found to be of unquestionable agricultural character; so you see they would neither give me the land nor sell me the timber for cash. Six years have passed since these lands were locked up. Congress never intended that its laws should be nullified by a "discretionary" power assumed by an acting assistant district forest ranger.

Charge No. 10. I do not doubt the truth of the charge.

There are many other serious charges against the Forest Service, and the great wonder to me is that instead of investigating the truth of the charges they are met by a huge bluff. You, of all men, should know how difficult it is to prove charges that involve "big business," "special interests," and Government officials. It is common everyday talk that forest officials "have a price." It is generally considered that big appropriations is synonymous with big forest fires. Your personal appeal was turned down as a rebuke to the corruptness of the Forest Service, and so instead of asking our Senators and Congressmen to work for big appropriations that would enable us to participate in the graft, we urged them to fight the appropriation and save the forests.

A hundred settlers in the national forest will prevent more fires than a million dollars and a hundred thousand typewriters in the hands of the Forest Service.

And now, sir, I believe I am as good and true a conservationist, as good and true a friend to the national forests, as is the president of the National Conservation Association. I am the man who lost his job in Alaska because I was fighting for the conservation of humanity. The Bureau of Education of this great Government made their boast that they would get me "fired," and they did; but not until I had landed one of their number in the pen for robbing the Indians. Although it hurt, I never squealed, but kept right on fighting. If you doubt I am a conservationist, get the records in that case, or, better still, let me send them to you complete. Read my article on "The Use of Game," Forest and Stream, July 22, 1911. Read my article, "Did Taft do Wrong in the Controller Bay matter?" Northern Idaho News, December, 1911. Read my address to the joint reclamation meeting, Creston, British Columbia, January 26, 1912. Yet I am proud to be called one of the "enemy of the Forest Service" so long as it overrides and nullifies the laws of Congress. If you doubt that I am a fair fighter as an enemy read my address to the Federated Commercial Clubs of the Inland Empire, Sandpoint, Idaho, last winter on "The Crime against Idaho." This is not a political question in the West. Democratic Gov. Hawley and Republican Senator Borah, Democratic Gov. Norris, of Montana, and Republican Gov. Hay, of Washington, are all standing shoulder to shoulder in fighting the crime against Idaho, Washington, and Montana.

So long as a Forest Service regulation administered by the discretionary whim of a forest official can nullify and override the laws of Congress, just so long will we fight.

There is but one way in which the National Conservation Association can save the forests, and that is join (the enemy) and purge and purify the Forest Service. In my humble opinion, the deathblow to conservation will be struck when the administration of public lands, etc., now embraced in forest reserves is turned over to the States. As for me, I would rather see every acre of forest land glutted and despoiled than live under the persecution and domination of the present Forest Service or turned over to State control. With all the power of my tongue and pen I will fight until the damnable despotism is wiped out.

There is one man (Col. Roosevelt) great enough and strong enough to right the wrong and save the forests, but he, too, has been deceived and has forgotten the man called "settler." He is too busy now busting trusts and fighting imaginary foes to listen to the cry of anguish that he would hear, and so we must punish him and punish ourselves.

This letter is only the voice of one humble citizen driven to desperation by the very creature which you and he created for my protection; and yet you call me "land grabber," until I have lost faith in the sacred tradition that in free America even the humblest can get a fair and a square deal. Your letter to me is evidence that you have heard the rumblings from the West. Very soon you will hear the roar of a maddened empire. And yet, sir, I do you the honor to believe that we both want the same conservation. We both want the national forests. Why, then, should we not be fighting a common cause? I believe it is because (you) the powerful conservation association has neglected its opportunity of investigation; because you have allowed the howl of special interests—there are special interests on both sides of this question—to drown the cry of the man seeking to build a home for himself and children; because instead of righting a wrong you are perpetuating it; because the incompetency of the Forest Service can not discriminate between special interests and honest settler.

Now, sir, I have written plainly. My neighbors would indorse this letter but for the fear of antagonizing the Forest Service and losing their land. I have no right to ask them. You can find them if you desire to. I have touched upon but one phase—the personal phase, if you please. I have equally strong views upon other phases of the great conservation problem.

Sincerely, yours,

C. W. H. HEIDEMAN.

VICTORY FOR CONSERVATION—AFTER 10 YEARS' FIGHT OPPONENTS OF PINCHOT POLICY DIE.

A. L. Manning and Mrs. Fannie E. Manning, defendants in a Forestry Service contest against their homestead in Snohomish County, lost their case to-day in the General Land Office when both failed to appear to answer the charges of the Government. After waiting for more than 10 years to obtain their patent, death claimed both. As a result 160 more acres have been added to the ground being conserved for posterity.

W. F. Straley and W. S. Boyer, representing the Government, appeared at the appointed time before Registrar John C. Denny and Receiver Albert Saylor to prosecute their case Contest had been filed against the homestead because it was within the Snoqualmie forest service, set aside by an Executive order of the then President, Theodore Roosevelt.

The defendants had settled on the land years before, when the forest reserve was unheard of and when special inducements were being offered to pioneers to come into this State and build up the country. After the region had been surveyed they began waiting for the patent, but the conservation theories of Gifford Pinchot and his followers prevented the consummation.

Death finally stepped in, and Mrs. Manning was left a widow to defend the contest against her claim.

Date for the hearing was set this morning, but she did not appear. Death had also taken her. As a result the Forestry Service registered another victory, and the land was restored to the reservation by default.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein certain findings by the Bureau of Corporations in regard to the present ownership of standing timber in the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and to incorporate therein certain findings made by the Bureau of Corporations as to standing timber in the United States. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know how much of a document this is that the gentleman proposes to insert in the RECORD, and whether or no it is the same article which in whole or in part was inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have not seen the gentleman's article, but I want to say that I include in my remarks largely the report of Mr. Smith, then at the head of the Bureau of Corporations. I should say it was a matter of four or five thousand words.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. There would be no patience anywhere with the recent onslaught upon the policy of conservation of our national timber reserve if this simple little sentence could be placed before every voter in the country, to wit: One hundred and ninety-five holders own over 40 per cent of the country's timber.

And there would be nation-wide indignation at any suggestion of abandonment of the plan of forest reservation if the people knew that three owners hold over one-tenth of all the privately owned timber in the entire Nation—that is, if every citizen in the country could be reached with this single fact, to wit:

Of the 1,013,000,000,000 feet of privately owned timber in the Pacific Northwest three holders—the Southern Pacific Railway, the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., and the Northern Pacific Railway—own one-fourth.

There would follow a storm of popular protest against an anti-conservation attitude that no man here or elsewhere would care to face.

The story of the concentration of ownership of timber in the United States, astounding and appalling in its details, is told in a Government document issued January 20, 1913, under the title "The lumber industry—Part I, Standing timber." It is the result of an investigation by the Bureau of Corporations.

The startling revelations of this report are particularly pertinent at this moment because of the attacks here upon that bureau of the Government, which is protecting our timber and standing for policies which will prevent further concentration—concentration which means the enrichment of the few and the impoverishment of the many. For back of the concentration lurks the most sinister of all the democracy's perils—a monopoly in land. I desire to give certain salient facts and with them certain quotations from this report on the lumber industry. I will set forth:

First. The concentration in ownership in the three principal timbered sections of the country.

Second. The official narration of the means by which concentration in timber holdings was accomplished.

Third. The conclusions of the Commissioner of Corporations on the gravity of the findings.

THE EXTENT OF CONCENTRATION.

First. Of the 2,800,000,000,000 board feet, estimated stand of timber in the country, outside of Alaska, four-fifths is privately owned. Of the standing timber on the land 54 per cent is in the Pacific northwest, 28 per cent in the southern pine region, and 5 per cent in the Lake States. Now, in the Pacific northwest the timber stand is 1,500,000,000,000 feet. Of this total 1,013,000,000,000 feet is privately owned. Three holders, the Southern Pacific Railway, the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., and the Northern Pacific Railway, own one-fourth.

The southern pine region has 634,000,000,000 feet of standing timber. Of this 29 holders own one-sixth. Sixty-seven holders own 39 per cent of the long-leaf pine.

The Lake States have 100,000,000,000 feet. Ten holders own 16 per cent. Forty-four holders own 37 per cent. Six holders own 54 per cent of the pine.

HOW CONCENTRATION WAS ACCOMPLISHED.

Second. The report of the Bureau of Corporations gives as a primary cause of concentration in timber ownership our public-land policy. The report says on this score that a clear insight into the results of the land policy thus far pursued is necessary to a wise settlement of questions of the first magnitude now before the country involving its natural resources. The report says further:

The land legislation which has been especially responsible for the present concentration of timber ownership may be divided into two classes: (1) Land grants: Special grants for railroads, wagon roads, canals, and river improvements; and general grants to States for educational purposes, drainage, internal improvements, etc. (2) General land laws: The cash-sale law, the scrip and warrant acts, the preemption and homestead laws, and the timber and stone law. These grants and general laws, loosely drawn and loosely administered, were direct causes of the concentration of timber ownership now existing.

The story of the land grants to railroads is a familiar one. One-eighth of the area of "public-land States"—155,000,000 acres—were given the railroads. Up to June 30, 1910, the immense total of 113,660,000 acres had been actually patented to railroads under their grants. This is practically the equivalent of the entire land area of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The retention by the Southern Pacific and the Northern Pacific and the purchase by the Weyerhaeuser Co. of these railroad grants form the basis of the three largest timber holdings in the country.

An equally interesting account of the process of concentration is given in the report on the administration of the public-land laws. The report of the bureau gives this summary of our land laws:

The most important general land laws of the United States were the private-sale law; the act making military-bounty land warrants assignable; the preemption law; the homestead law, with its commutation feature; and the timber and stone law. Historically, the underlying theory of the early land policy was that the public lands should be sold for revenue. To this end settlement without legal title was at first prohibited. Sales of land in unlimited tracts were made, credit being allowed at first, but after the breakdown of this system through overspeculation in land the sales were strictly for cash.

In the later development of the land policy emphasis began to be laid on the rights of the settler as against the mere land speculator, and various acts were passed, culminating in 1841 in the act known as the preemption law, which gave the settler a preference right to buy at $1.25 per acre one 160-acre tract in consideration of his residing thereon and improving it. This tendency toward favoring the settler seems at odds with the making of the immense land grants in the 20 years succeeding 1850. But, as pointed out above, the expectation was that the railroads would dispose of the lands to settlers much as the Government was doing; and when it was found that this was not being done public sentiment demanded that whenever new grants were made or old ones revived conditions should be imposed requiring sale of granted land in small tracts to actual settlers.

The homestead law of 1862 carried the preemption law a step further by giving one 160-acre tract free in consideration of residence and cultivation. This law made the preemption law unnecessary, yet the latter was not repealed till 1891. The abuse of these laws in the timber regions will be pointed out below, but on the whole they were of substantial benefit in the agricultural development of the country.

The timber and stone law of 1878, which has conspicuously failed to accomplish its apparent purpose, was originally urged on the ground that the settler, limited to his 160 acres of cultivated land, needed a "wood lot" to supply timber for his domestic use; and that for local commercial use, in districts where the public lands had not been offered for sale, there was no legitimate way of getting timber from the public domain. Within five years the practical effect of this law in transferring public timberlands almost directly to large corporations and timber speculators was recognized in official reports, and its repeal was strongly urged. It nevertheless still remains in effect.

After dealing with the cash-sale law and scrip acts the report gives an account of the abuse of preemption, homestead, and timber and stone laws. It says:

The general land laws, the cash-sale law, and the law making military warrants assignable placed no limit on the amount of land any one person could acquire from the Government. The Federal preemption, homestead, and timber and stone laws, on the other hand, limited each individual to a 160-acre tract; yet under cover of these laws great areas of timberland have passed from the possession of the Government in tracts of 160 acres each, only to fall almost directly into the hands of large timber owners.

It has been noted above that some of the State land laws limited the amount of State land that could be taken by any individual, without thereby securing any effective check against the speedy transfer of the individual's right in the land to some great timber holder, who practically used many such individuals to build up a great holding. The same has been true on a far larger scale of the Federal preemption, homestead, and timber and stone laws.

Preemption and homestead laws: The Public Land Commission (of 1879), in its preliminary report, February 24, 1880, said:

"Until the passage of the act of June 3, 1878, entitled 'An act for the sale of timberlands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and in Washington Territory,' there was no manner by which timber or timberlands in either of the States or the Territory mentioned could be obtained excepting by settlement under the homestead and preemption laws, and by the location of certain kinds of scrip and additional homestead rights, which cost several dollars per acre.

"Settlements upon timber-bearing lands in the States and Territory mentioned in the act, under the homestead and preemption laws, are usually a mere pretense for getting the timber. Compliance with those laws in good faith where settlements are made on lands bearing timber of commercial value is well-nigh impossible, as the lands in most cases possess no agricultural value, and hence a compliance with the law requiring cultivation is impracticable.

"The commission visited the redwood-producing portion of the State of California, and saw little huts or kennels built of 'shakes' that were totally unfit for human habitation, and always had been, which were the sole improvements made under the homestead and preemption laws, and by means of which large areas of redwood forests, possessing great value, had been taken under pretenses of settlement and cultivation which were the purest fictions, never having any real existence in fact, but of which 'due proof' had been made under the laws."

Many official recommendations were made for the repeal of the preemption law, and in 1891 it was repealed. All its purposes were better fulfilled by the homestead law, and for years before its repeal it had been used as an easy means of transferring public lands to large speculators in agricultural and timber lands.

The commutation clause of the homestead law: Congress, in recognition of the fact that misfortune or change of circumstances might befall a settler, provided by a clause in the homestead act of 1862 that any claimant after 14 months' residence and cultivation might "commute" his entry; that is, purchase the land at $1.25 or $2.50 per acre at the end of the 14 months, instead of getting it free at the end of 5 years of residence and cultivation. There is no such thing as a separate and distinct law allowing the entry of agricultural land with intent to commute. The applicant for homestead land must swear, among other things, that he takes the land in "good faith for the purpose of making a home for himself" and not for speculation or sale. The commutation clause, however, allows him to buy the land after 14 months, if his original plans should change.

While the wording of the commutation clause required 14 months' residence and cultivation, the Interior Department until recently held that since homesteaders are given 6 months from the date of entry to establish themselves on the land, therefore 8 months' actual residence immediately following this 6 months was a sufficient compliance with that part of the law requiring 14 months' residence before commutation. This construction of the clause was given the force of actual law, as to former entries, by a recent Congress, but now the full 14 months is required in actual residence.

During the four years from July 1, 1899, to June 30, 1903, 1,485 homestead commutations were made in the timber belt of Minnesota alone, covering 192,189 acres, on which the timber was then estimated at 297,000,000 feet. The Government received $251,306.55, or 85 cents per thousand on the estimated amount of timber. A committee appointed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office estimated the value of the timber at that time at $3 a thousand, or $891,000, giving an immediate loss to the Government of $639,693.45, besides the value of the land itself.

The following passage is from the report of this committee:

"The effect of the commutation clause of the homestead act within the State of Minnesota has been to place millions of feet of merchantable timber and hundreds of acres of prospective mineral lands in the hands of lumbering and mining corporations, with prospective profits of thousands of dollars to their present owners.

* * * * * * *

"The head of a large lumber company at Duluth, Minn., is authority for the statement, made in the presence of a member of your committee, that between the years 1885 and 1890 a certain lumber company of Minnesota and himself, together with others, obtained thousands of acres of pine lands from the Government under the old preemption law by simply filing names of persons found in the St. Paul (Minn.) and Chicago (Ill.) directories. When time for proof came, one set of men would appear at the local office and make proof on all claims set for that date. This gentleman also stated that he and the said lumber company had a standing agreement with the local land officers whereby they were to permit this kind of proofs for a consideration of $25 per claim. He denied that it was continued after the repeal of the old preemption law, but there is to be found strong evidence that this same system was continued as late as 1894 under the commutation clause of the homestead act.

"It is common knowledge in the city of Duluth, Minn., that in 1892, 1893, and 1894 persons desiring to commute would take an ordinary dry-goods box, make it resemble a small house with doors, windows, and a shingled roof. This box would be 14 by 16 inches or larger and would be taken by the entryman to his claim. On date of commutation proof he would appear at the local office, swear that he had upon his claim a good board house, 14 by 16, with shingled roof, doors, windows, etc. The proof on its face would appear excellent and was readily passed by the local officers."

In 1909 H. H. Schwartz, at that time chief of field service of the General Land Office, commented as follows on the commutation clause of the homestead law:

"It has been my experience and observation in 10 years of field service that the commuted homestead is almost universally an entry initiated with a full intent never to make the land a home. Before the timber and stone law was extended to all public-land States the commutation clause in the homestead law was the vehicle through which timber was fraudulently acquired from the Government.

"It has been my personal experience to examine solid townships in northern Wisconsin, in which practically all the even-numbered sections had been acquired under the homestead law, quite generally commutation. The timber had been cut off after patent, and yet not a single voter or inhabitant could be found in the township. The Government got $400 a quarter section for lands frequently worth from $10,000 to $20,000. More recently actual farmers have purchased these stump lands from the mill companies.

"'Commutation' is the clause in the homestead law under which citizens who are not farmers or ranchers and who have no intention of ever becoming such enter agricultural or valuable timberlands.

* * * * * * * *

"Actual inspection of hundreds of commuted homesteads shows that not one in a hundred is ever occupied as a home after commutation. They become part of some large timber holding or parcel of a cattle or sheep ranch.

* * * * * * * *

"Since the passage of the first commutation clause in the homestead law in 1862 there have been practically 35,000,000 acres of land acquired thereunder. The Government received probably $70,000,000 for lands worth over $350,000,000 at the time title left the United States.

"The average yearly acreage commuted has been approximately 600,000. It is noted, however, that in the past few years the acreage of land annually commuted has largely increased. In 1905 there was a slight excess above 1,400,000 acres sold; in 1908 the acreage had increased to 3,124,277.

"This increase coincides with the closer inspection and enforcement of the public-land law. Because of the inspection, those who are 'dummies' for investors in timber or cattle or sheep concerns and those who have no actual intent to make homes upon the land are now unable to give such physical presence and cultivation to the land as will permit them to make a 5-year proof. As a consequence they put in 8 months' time on the land and thereupon commute. At present 14 months' actual residence is required."

Below is shown the manner in which the United States parted with its title to some 34 of the most valuable sections of timberland in Pierce County, Wash. Twenty-three quarter sections were obtained by homestead entries. Each of these entries, if made in good faith, involved the establishment of a home, and a home could not be established without a clearing. The following table shows how many acres on each of these "homesteads" were reported by the assessor in 1910 as free from timber:

[1] These four tracts, being three "homesteads" and three-fourths of another, are owned by one lumber company and are assessed together. The assessment shows 15 acres untimbered on the four tracts, but does not show on what tract the clear land is.

[2] These two tracts, of 120 acres and 40 acres, respectively, were obtained from the Government as one "homestead." The 40-acre piece is assessed to an individual, and 18 acres of it are reported free from timber. The other 120 acres are owned by the same great timber company that owns the rest of the section.

On the 23 "homesteads," 3,676 acres, the whole amount of unforested land, whether naturally barren or cleared by man, is 33 acres. This clearing may be all on one claim, and, if not on one, is probably on two. Of the 23 "homesteads," at least 19, probably 21, and possibly 22, have no cleared land whatever.

THE TIMBER AND STONE ACT.

The act of June 3, 1878, entitled "An act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and in Washington Territory," is commonly called the "timber and stone act." Later the act was extended to all the public-land States. It provided for the sale, at not less than $2.50 an acre, to citizens of the United States or persons who had declared their intention to become citizens, of all such land as was chiefly valuable for timber or stone. Not more than 160 acres was to be sold to one person; but this interposed no serious obstacle to the acquisition of unlimited quantities through dummy entrymen.

The practical effect of the timber and stone act in aiding timber companies to assemble large holdings was early discovered, but it is still unrepealed. In 1883, five years after its passage, the Commissioner of the General Land Office vigorously denounced the law, and its repeal has been frequently urged in official reports of the Land Office, in the report of the Public Lands Commission in 1905, and in the report of the National Conservation Commission in 1909.

The law specifies that lands taken under it "may be sold * * * at the minimum price of $2.50 per acre." In administrative practice, until November 30, 1908, the maximum price asked was $2.50, as if the law had read "shall be sold." Since that date, by order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, tracts taken have been appraised and the price fixed with reference to the amount and value of the timber and land, but at not less than $2.50 per acre. This is an improvement of administration, but it does not remedy the vital defects of the statute.

The criminal prosecution of timber frauds under this law, and of other public-land frauds as well, has been greatly hindered and in many cases prevented by the statute of limitations (U. S. Comp. Stat., ch. 19), which provides that a prosecution for criminal offenses against the United States (other than certain excepted crimes) is barred after a lapse of three years. As to recovery of the lands themselves, fraudulent entries may be canceled by the Interior Department at any time prior to patent. After patent has issued, any suit by the United States to annul or cancel it and recover the lands must be brought within six years of the date of the patent. (Act of Mar. 3, 1891, 26 Stat., 1099.)

On the evil effects of the timber and stone law in general it is sufficient to refer to five official reports: The first that of the Public Land Commission in 1880, the second that of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in 1883, the third that of the same officer for 1886, the fourth that of the Public Land Commission in 1905, and the fifth that of the National Conservation Commission in 1909.

The first Public Land Commission as early as 1880 recommended a law for timberlands, which provided for retaining the fee ownership of natural forest land, selling the product on lease, and maintaining a perpetual supply. These recommendations of the commission were not enacted into law.

A report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in 1883 clearly pointed out the abuses under the timber and stone act, in part as follows:

"The present and increasing value of timber is an inducement to individuals and companies to make large investments with a view to the control of the timber product, and the further enhancement of prices resulting from such control. The facility with which the restrictions of the public-land laws are evaded is a temptation to the illegal acquirement of title for the purpose of such investments.

"It would perhaps be of little moment how soon the public title to lands should pass to private holders, since that is the ultimate purpose of the laws, if the further purpose of the laws that public lands should in the original instance be widely distributed among the people could also be secured. But if this can not be done, and the systems of public disposal are to result, as they now do, in permitting capitalists to indirectly obtain great bodies of public land, it is certainly but provident for the United States to require a price to be paid for its timberlands somewhat commensurate to their value.

"Several propositions have been presented in Congress looking to a change in the methods of disposing of lands valuable chiefly for timber. The subject is one of difficulty, and it is important that the wisest action be taken. I am of opinion that such lands should be reserved by law from ordinary disposal, and sold only after appraisement and upon sealed bids, at not less than the appraised price. It would be proper that an act to such effect should not deprive settlers on the public lands of the right to take timber for domestic purposes or the support of their improvements."

Again, in his annual report for 1886, the Commissioner of the General Land Office gave numerous specific instances of violations of the timber and stone law.

The Public Lands Commission of 1903 in its second partial report of February 13, 1905, in speaking of the frauds under this law, pointed out that in many cases transfers of the land were made to lumber companies immediately, often on the same day as the title was received; that the original entrymen rarely realized more than ordinary wages for the time spent in making the entry and completing the transfer; that the corporations which ultimately secured the land usually absorbed by far the greater part of the profit; and that the timber was withdrawn from use till the corporations that owned it saw fit to cut.

The commission urged the repeal of the timber and stone act, and in its place recommended the sale of timber (without the land) on the remaining unreserved public domain, as follows:

"We recommend the enactment of a law under which it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the highest bidder, at public outcry or otherwise, under such rules and regulations and subject to such conditions and restrictions and in such quantities as he may prescribe, the right to cut and remove, within such period of time as he may fix, any timber from any unappropriated, nonmineral, surveyed public lands, after first having had such timber duly appraised, and after giving public notice of the time, terms, manner, and place of such sale; that he shall have power and authority to reject any and all bids offered at any such sale, and that it shall be unlawful for any purchaser at such sale to sell, transfer, assign, or in any manner alienate the rights secured by him under this act, except as authorized by said Secretary; * * * and that no lands valuable chiefly for timber shall hereafter be patented under the commutation provisions of the homestead laws; that any person who violates any of these provisions, or any regulation or requirement prescribed pursuant thereto, shall forfeit to the United States all benefits conferred, and all moneys paid by him, and that any right to cut and remove timber which he may then hold shall be canceled and revoked."

The commission also urged the classification of lands. Its recommendations quoted above have not been enacted into law.

A further statement as to the results of the timber and stone act was made in 1909 in connection with the report of the National Conservation Commission, by Mr. H. H. Schwartz, whose statement on the commutation clause of the homestead act has already been given. Mr. Schwartz said in part:

"In practice * * * this law has resulted in the sale of over 12,000,000 acres of valuable timberlands, of which fully 10,000,000 acres were transferred to corporate or individual timberland investors by the entrymen. These lands brought to the people or General Government a gross sum of $30,000,000. At the date of sale they were reasonably worth $240,000,000. The profit of over $200,000,000 went not to the needy settler engaged in subduing the wilderness, but to the wealthy investors. Not over a fractional part of 1 per cent of the timber purchased from the United States under this act is held, consumed, or even cut by the men and women who made the entries.

"The law requires, and each applicant makes, an oath containing, among other things, the following:

"'That he does not apply to purchase the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his own use and benefit; and that he has not directly or indirectly made any agreement or contract in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatever, by which the title he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure, in whole or part, to the benefit of any person except himself.'

"The Supreme Court, in United States v. Budd (144 U. S., 154), holds that an entry and purchase made with intent to sell at an advance if the market improves, and with no intent to use the timber itself, is not a 'purchase for speculation.'

* * * * * * *

"With enough entrymen possessed of $500 each, or credit to borrow that amount, and a prospective buyer at a small advance, the machinery is complete for transferring title from the Government, or general public, to the single corporate or individual investor. The process has been automatic, and in most cases neither fraud, perjury, nor false swearing is needed.

* * * * * * *

"Since January 6, 1908, the person entering timberlands, where some investor has given his notice of a willingness to buy all lands entered, need not even have the $500 with which to buy, nor need he have credit upon which he may borrow that amount. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of United States v. Williamson (207 U. S., 425), decided upon the above date, holds that an entryman who has filed his sworn statement designating the particular tract he desires to purchase may, between the date of so filing and the date of actual payment—the 60 or 90 days during which he advertises his application to purchase—lawfully contract to sell or convey the land after patent issues. In other words, he may enter the lands with an intent to sell at once if he can make a profit; the corporate or individual investor may inform him that he will buy at a profit; after the entry is made, and before the applicant advances a dollar of the purchase price, entryman and prospective purchaser may contract to convey and the investor bind the bargain by depositing with entryman's attorney enough of the sale price to pay the Government for the land, and the identical money advanced on the lawful contract to sell is paid over the counter of the land office by entryman's attorney at final proof.

"There is no fraud in the entryman; no risk to the investor; and a single concern may secure a wood lot of 100,000 acres in less than a year, at a profit of $1,000,000 to the corporation and at a loss of the same sum to the general public, which is the Government.

"I recall a specific instance in the Susanville and Redding districts, California, where a single investor, in the course of probably three years, acquired approximately 700,000 acres of heavily timbered lands, a large amount of which was secured under the timber and stone act.

"In another large operation in central Oregon trainloads of women school-teachers were shipped out from Minnesota and entered lands under the timber and stone act. A hundred citizens of Oregon made like entries. These lands were then transferred to a timber investor from Minneapolis, Minn., transfers going to him by deeds to a corporation. The articles of this incorporation were peculiar. They provided that only the president need own stock therein. Its officers were composed of the president (who was the investor) and his wife and son, who were, respectively, secretary and treasurer.

"During the past 10 years there have been like individual operations in Montana, Idaho, Washington, and Colorado."

An excellent illustration, not only of the actual working of the homestead and the timber and stone laws, but also of the danger involved in making eliminations from the national forests, is found in the Olympic Peninsula of Washington. Over 400,000 acres (net area) were eliminated from the Olympic National Forest in 1900 and 1901 on the ground that the land was chiefly valuable for agriculture and that the settlement of the country was being retarded. The land thus eliminated for agricultural use was largely taken up under the timber and stone law, which requires oath that the land is "valuable chiefly for timber, but not fit for cultivation." It is now (10 years later) held mostly by great timber holders in private instead of public reserves. Only 100 settlers are living in the area eliminated, and the total amount of land they have in cultivation is only 570 acres, an average of less than 6 acres to the settler. Thus, the alleged purpose of the elimination was defeated and bona fide settlement was not advanced.

The fact that the land policy of the past 60 years has resulted in transferring great tracts of timberland from the public to a limited number of individuals becomes more significant when the values involved are considered. Two concrete examples of the prodigality of the policy are here given.

The bureau selected some 34 sections of the best timberland in Pierce County, Wash., and then traced the manner in which these sections were originally alienated by the United States and the amount received by it for them. The sections were chosen for their relatively high assessed valuation, ranging from $25,000 to $52,000 per section of 640 acres. They are not intended to be regarded as average or as typical, though it is believed that there are many other equally striking instances. The exact area of the timberland selected for this study was 21,602 acres. The total assessed valuation of the timber (exclusive of the land) in 1910 was $1,132,389. It is probable that the cash value of the timber on the individual sections would range from about $50,000 to about $125,000, and that the cash value of the whole is from $2,250,000 to $2,750,000.

Except for the land in the Northern Pacific grant and the school sections the earliest date of initiation of any right to these lands was 1889, only 22 years ago, and (with the exception of school sections which passed to the State without patent) all of it, including the railroad land, has been patented within the last 18 years. Nearly all was alienated without cash recompense, and in no case for a greater consideration than $2.50 an acre. For the 5,082 acres not included in the Northern Pacific grant and the State grants the Government received less than $5,000.

Nearly all the tracts shown in the table have passed into the hands of great corporations. Thus, 12,023 acres, with an assessed valuation of $653,289 and a probable cash value of about $1,200,000 or $1,500,000, is assessed to the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., and 6,080 acres, with an assessed value of $308,260 and a probable cash value of from $600,000 to $750,000, is assessed to the St. Paul & Tacoma Lumber Co.

In 1909 an estimate of the present value of certain lands included in court cases, or before the Interior Department, on charges of illegality or fraudulent acquisition from the public domain, was officially submitted to Congress in connection with the request of the General Land Office for the special appropriation of $1,000,000 which was made to investigate and prosecute the cases. This estimate showed a total valuation of $114,733,273 for the lands involved in the cases listed. The statement does not in all cases show the acreage involved, but, taking this where it is shown, it is found that the estimated value of 556,861 acres of land claimed or secured under the settlement or timber and stone laws, as placer locations, or under the land grants, is no less than $32,581,400. This is an average of over $58 per acre, whereas for some of this land the Government received no cash payment and for none of it more than $2.50 an acre. The 556,861 acres includes, however, 300 acres of mineral lands alleged to have been erroneously acquired under the Union Pacific grant (which excluded minerals). The estimated value of the 300 acres is $15,000,000, or $50,000 an acre. It also includes 161,600 acres of coal lands taken under timber or under nonmineral forms of entry, valued at $9,360,000, an average of $58 an acre, or over twenty-three times the highest price received by the Government for any of it. Of timberlands proper, it includes 288,201 acres, with a valuation of $7,135,800, equivalent to $25 per acre, or ten times the highest price received by the Government. In point of size, the main item of this 288,201 acres is a holding of 200,000 acres of timberland within the boundaries of the forest reserve taken up as placer locations, the Government price of which is $2.50 per acre. This is valued at $5,000,000, or $25 per acre.

Besides the 556,861 acres referred to, the statement shows 84,262 acres of mineral and coal land entries, other than placer locations, alleged to be fraudulent, with an estimated present value of $15,355,840. Of this, 78,000 acres is coal land, valued at over $15,000,000, an average of $193 per acre, as against the regular Government price of $10 or $20. A single case involved 40,000 acres of coal land, valued at $200 an acre, or $8,000,000. One item of the statement which specifies no acreage covers four suits involving mineral lands acquired under railroad grants which excluded minerals. The value of the lands comprised in the four suits is placed at over $25,000,000.

This estimate of the values involved in land cases pending in 1909 (irrespective of whether in the final outcome the Government or the private claimant obtains the land) strikingly illustrates how the Government's land policy with reference to timberlands—as distinct from agricultural lands—as it has actually worked out in practice, has disposed of immense public wealth in timber and other resources without securing any adequate return therefor in money or social advantage. Furthermore, this wealth, instead of having been distributed among a vast number of independent owners, as contemplated by the original spirit of this policy, has actually been concentrated to a very marked degree in a comparatively few hands.

In this chapter there has been an attempt to set forth some of the principal features of the public-land policy which have contributed to the present concentration of timber ownership. There have been traced partially here and there the effects of Federal laws disposing of the public domain, such as the great land grants, cash sales, and the homestead and the timber and stone laws. Much of the legislation in question, including the land grants, was expected to bring about ultimately a distribution of public lands in comparatively small tracts. As a matter of fact, so far at least as the timber regions are concerned, most of it has signally failed in this respect. Instead, the facts presented in this report show that timberlands alienated in immense grants have largely been retained by the original grantees or transferred in great blocks; and even where alienated in small tracts under the general land laws, such lands have largely been gathered into great holdings by timber speculators.

Altogether, it is clear that there has been a lavish dissipation of standing timber and other natural resources of the national domain, and that the beneficiaries of this policy have too frequently been not actual settlers but capitalists who have been able to take advantage of this legislation or its faulty administration and thus to accumulate vast holdings of timberland at a comparatively small cost and reap therefrom an enormous profit.

A striking fact is that the operation of much of this legislation was early understood and condemned by careful observers. That such warnings as those of public-land commissions and other public officers were so long disregarded is partly explained, no doubt, by the counter-pressure of local self-interest and the persistent efforts of beneficiaries of such legislation. However, it was also due in some part to the easy-going attitude of the public itself, which at that time looked upon these resources as practically inexhaustible. This attitude of the public was also to some extent attributable to the specious character of some of this legislation, especially the apparent limitation of the amount of land available to a single individual, which seemed to assure a wide distribution of ownership.

The development of public opinion affecting the country's natural resources has been very slow, and it must be remembered that in judging the public-land policy of a generation ago allowance must be made for conditions then existing. It would seem, however, that the public mind has at last been awakened to a realization of the fact that the present supply of standing timber is not inexhaustible. The creation of national forests, which reserved from private acquisition a large part of the timbered areas still remaining in public ownership, definitely marked a fundamental change in policy, and this is also indicated by the progress in recent years toward scientific and accurate classification of the remaining resources of the public domain. However, there is now a disposition to secure the alienation of timberland from national forests under the subterfuge of settlement. The experience of the past, as set forth in this report, may therefore be pertinently emphasized at this time.

It is also desirable to call attention to the fundamental difference between the sale of agricultural lands to actual settlers, who by their industry improve this land and thereby contribute to the development of the community, and the alienation of timberlands, which do not require improvement and the value of which tends almost certainly to rise because of reduction in the supply and increase in population. The mere acquisition of timberlands from the public domain and their speculative holding involve only a negligible service to the public, while the concentration of the ownership of such lands, as set forth in this report, constitutes a serious public danger.

While much of the public domain has been dissipated in the manner indicated, it may be repeated, as already shown, that the Government is still the largest single owner of standing timber. While much of its timber is of relatively low value, nevertheless, in view of the fact that the Government is in an especially advantageous position for the practice of reforestation on an extensive scale, it seems that it should be able at a later date to materially strengthen its relative position as a timber owner. A further addition to its holdings may, moreover, be brought about as a result of forfeiture suits, some of which are now in progress. The facts set forth in this report clearly point to the desirability of maintaining the integrity of the national forests, and, furthermore, suggest the desirability of the extension of the essential principles of the national-forest policy to such publicly owned timber as now stands on lands outside of these reserves, including forests of Alaska, possibly by bringing such lands within national-forest limits. It would seem that the same principles should also be extended to lands recovered by the Government in suits for forfeiture of title. This, however, affords only a partial solution of the grave problems involved in the concentration of the privately owned timber of the country.

THE GRAVITY OF THE SITUATION.

Third. Luther Conant, jr., Commissioner of Corporations, in his report to the President, 1913, on this whole subject, declares that the facts found clearly point to the desirability of maintaining the integrity of the national forests and of extending to other publicly owned timber, including forests in Alaska, "the cardinal principle of the national-forest policy, the retention of the fee to such lands at least until the timber is removed."

The Commissioner of Corporations who preceded Mr. Conant in the office, Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, in a communication to the President in 1911, said in submitting this report on standing timber:

The foremost facts shown are:

(1) The concentration of a dominating control of our standing timber in a comparatively few enormous holdings, steadily tending toward a central control of the lumber industry.

(2) Vast speculative purchase and holding of timberland far in advance of any use thereof.

(3) An enormous increase in the value of this diminishing natural resource, with great profits to its owners. This value, by the very nature of standing timber, the holder neither created nor substantially enhances.

These are the underlying facts of tremendous significance to the public welfare. They are primarily the results of our public-land policy long continued. The laws that represent that policy are still largely operative. The past history and present status of our standing timber drive home upon us the imperative necessity of revising our public policy for the future management of all our remaining natural resources. That history is here outlined.

FROM GOVERNMENT TO PRIVATE OWNERSHIP.

Only 40 years ago at least three-fourths of the timber now standing was, it is estimated, publicly owned. Now about four-fifths of it is privately owned. The great bulk of it passed from Government to private hands through (a) enormous railroad, canal, and wagon-road grants by the Federal Government; (b) direct Government sales in unlimited quantities at $1.25 an acre; (c) certain public-land laws, great tracts being assembled in spite of the legal requirements for small holdings. Such laws were wholly inappropriate to forest regions; but, though vigorously condemned in several public reports, they are still largely in force. In theory they were intended to distribute the public lands in small tracts as homes for freeholders. In fact, they actually furthered timber concentration in vast holdings. The 1,802 largest holdings of timber (as compared with a vastly wider distribution of public lands in nontimbered agricultural sections) involve 79,092,000 acres of timberland—including a considerable acreage of timber rights in the southern pine region—and in addition some of these holders own 10,652,000 acres lying in timbered parts but not now bearing merchantable timber.

During this interval, and chiefly in the latter half thereof, the value of standing timber has increased tenfold, twentyfold, and even fiftyfold, according to local conditions. The present annual growth is only about one-third of the present annual cut. Replacement by new growth is very slow.

Examples of the increase during this interval are: From $5 to $30 an acre, $7 to $40, $20 to $150, $1 to $13, $4 to $140, $1 to $50. Specific tracts have been sold first for $24,000 and later for $153,000; $10,000, and later $124,000; $240,000, and later $2,500,000; $23,000, and later $500,000; $25,000, and later $1,125,000. These examples illustrate the remarkable profit made by certain individual holders.

What did the Government get for the timber? Of the southern pine sold for $1.25 an acre, much is now worth $60 an acre. Large amounts of Douglas fir in western Washington and Oregon, which the Government gave away or sold at $2.50 an acre, now range from $100 to $200 per acre. The great redwood belt in California was alienated on similar terms, and some of it is now worth hundreds of dollars an acre. Practically none of the great forests in the public-land States was sold by the Government for more than $2.50 an acre. The great increase of value gives grave importance to the concentration of ownership.

The former Chief of Field Service of the General Land Office, H. H. Schwartz, stated officially (1909) that the timber and stone act "has resulted in the sale of over 12,000,000 acres of valuable timberlands, of which fully 10,000,000 acres were transferred to corporate or individual timberland investors by the entrymen. These lands brought to the people or General Government a gross sum of $30,000,000. At the date of sale they were reasonably worth $240,000,000. The profit of over $200,000,000 went not to the needy settler engaged in subduing the wilderness but to the wealthy investors. Not over a fractional part of 1 per cent of the timber purchased from the United States under this act is held, consumed, or even cut by the men and women who made the entries."

An effective illustration of what has happened under our land laws appears in the report of the United States Forester for 1910:

"An investigation emphasizes the probability that heavily timbered lands, if opened to entry, would pass into the hands of large owners of timber. Of 705,000 acres eliminated from the Olympic National Forest in 1900 and 1901, on the ground that the land was chiefly valuable for agriculture and that the settlement of the country was being retarded, 523,720 acres passed ultimately into the hands of owners who are holding it purely as a timber speculation. Three companies and two individuals own over 178,000 acres, in holdings of from 15,000 to over 80,000 acres each. Of timbered homestead claims on this eliminated area, held by 100 settlers, the total area under actual cultivation is only 570 acres, an average of but 5.7 acres to each claim. It will be seen that the original purpose of the elimination was defeated and that bona fide settlement was not materially advanced."

CONTROL OF THE TIMBER CONTROLS THE WHOLE INDUSTRY.

Whatever power over prices may arise from combinations in manufacture and distribution (as distinguished from timber owning), such power is insignficant and transitory compared to the control of the standing timber itself or a dominating part thereof. The Senate and House resolutions, to which this investigation is responsive, ask for the causes of the high prices of lumber and the effect of combination upon such prices. The resolutions, therefore, required determination of both the amount and the control of standing timber.

AMOUNT OF STANDING TIMBER.

There is now left in continental United States about 2,200,000,000,000 board feet of privately owned standing timber, of which 1,747,000,000,000 is in the "investigation area," covered in great detail by the bureau. This area includes the Pacific Northwest, the southern pine region, and the Lake States, and contains 80 per cent of all the private timber in the country. In addition, there are about 539,000,000,000 feet in the national forests and about 90,000,000,000 feet on other nonprivate lands. Thus the total amount of standing timber in continental United States is about 2,800,000,000,000 board feet. The present annual drain upon the supply of saw timber is about 50,000,000,000 feet. At this rate the timber now standing, without allowance for growth or decay, would last only about 55 years.

The present commercial value of the privately owned standing timber in the country, not including the value of the land, is estimated (though such an estimate must be very rough) as at least $6,000,000,000. Ultimately the consuming public will have to pay such prices for lumber as will give this timber a far greater value.

This is the first comprehensive and methodical investigation of the amount and ownership of our standing timber. It rests on the best information obtainable from records of timber owners or the knowledge of men in the industry, information which daily forms the basis of actual business dealings. (A physical canvass of the forests was out of the question.) The data collected by field work in about 900 counties, assembled, mapped, checked, and weighed in the office, are reliable within a relatively small margin of error. All figures relate to merchantable saw timber, in terms of lumber yield. The unit "board foot" is a foot square and an inch thick.

CONCENTRATION OF TIMBER OWNERSHIP.

Three vast holdings alone, the greatest in the country, those of the Southern Pacific Co., the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., and the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. (including their subsidiary companies) together have 238,000,000,000 feet, or nearly 11 per cent of all our privately owned timber. They have 14 per cent of that in the "investigation area." With the five next largest they have over 15 per cent of the total privately owned timber and over 19 per cent of that within the investigation area. Finally, nearly one-half (48 per cent) of the private timber in that area is held by only 195 great holders. The term "holder" covers any single interest—individual, corporate, or group—which is so united as to be under one control.

The Pacific Northwest: Five-elevenths of the country's privately owned standing timber is in the Pacific Northwest (California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana), 1,013,000,000,000 feet. One-half of this is now owned by 37 holders. Many of these are closely connected. The three largest holders (named above) alone have nearly one quarter. This section now furnishes only one-sixth of the annual cut. Thus its timber is being largely held for the future, and the large owners there will then be the dominating influence in the industry.

The Southern Pacific Co. holding is the greatest in the United States—106,000,000,000 feet. This is about 6 per cent of the private timber in the investigation area, and 10 per cent of that in the Pacific Northwest. It is difficult to give an adequate idea of its immensity. It stretches practically 680 miles along that railroad between Portland and Sacramento. The fastest train over this distance takes 31 hours. During all that time the traveler thereon is passing through lands a large proportion of which for 30 miles on each side belongs to the railroad, and in almost the entire strip this corporation is the dominating owner of both timber and land.

The second largest holder is the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co. (including its subsidiary companies), with 96,000,000,000 feet. This does not include further very extensive timber interests of the Weyerhaeuser family and close associates.

These two holdings would supply the 46,584 sawmills in the country for four and a half years. They have one-eleventh of our total private timber.

The third largest, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., has 36,000,000,000 feet.

These three holdings have enough standing timber to build an ordinary five or six room frame house for each of the 16,000,000 families in the United States in 1900. If sawed into lumber and placed in cars, their timber would load a train about 100,000 miles long.

The holdings of the two railroad companies are Government grants, and 80 per cent of the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co. holding was bought from the Northern Pacific grant. Many other large holdings (here and in other regions) were mainly purchased from some land grant.

Southern pine region: In the southern pine region there are 634,000,000,000 feet of privately owned timber. Concentration in total timber is much less than in the Pacific Northwest. There is, however, a high concentration in the more valuable species, longleaf yellow pine and cypress. Sixty-seven holders own 30 per cent of the longleaf yellow pine, 29 per cent of the cypress, 19 per cent of the shortleaf and loblolly pine, and 11 per cent of the hardwoods.

The Lake States: In Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan there are 100,000,000,000 feet of privately owned timber. In Wisconsin 96 holders have three-fourths of all the timber. In Michigan 110 holders have 66 per cent. In Minnesota 6 holders have 54 per cent of the very valuable white and Norway pine, 16 per cent of the other conifers, and 2 per cent of the hardwoods. Taking all three States, 215 holders have 65 per cent of all the timber.

EFFECT OF CONCENTRATION.

Such concentration in standing timber, if permitted to continue and increase, makes probable a final central control of the whole lumber industry. A few strong interests, ultimately holding the bulk of the timber, can set the price of timber and its products. The manager of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association recently said to lumbermen on the Pacific coast:

"The day of cheap lumber is passing and soon will be gone, but the men who make the money will be those who own timber and can hold it until the supply in other parts of the country is gone. Then they can ask and get their own price."

Certain further factors, not exactly measurable, increase still more the real concentration. First, a further interweaving of interests, corporate and personal, connects a great many holdings which the bureau has treated as separate; second, there are very large totals of timber so scattered in small tracts through larger holdings that they are substantially "blocked in" or "controlled" by the larger holders; third, the concentration is much higher in the more valuable species.

General information obtained indicates a very high concentration in timber ownership outside the investigation area.

POLICY OF GREAT HOLDERS.

The largest holders are cutting little of their timber. They thus reserve to themselves those incalculable profits which are still to accrue with the growth of the country, the diminishing of timber supply, and the further concentration and control thereof. Many of the very men who are protesting against conservation and the national forest system because of the "tying up" of natural resources are themselves deliberately tying them up far more effectively for private gain.

The fact that mature timber is thus withheld from use is clear evidence that great additional profits are expected to accrue through further increase in value.

LAND MONOPOLY.

Standing timber is not the only question. When the timber has been cut the land remains. There has been created, therefore, not only the framework of an enormous timber monopoly, but also an equally sinister land concentration in extensive sections. This involves also a great wealth in minerals. The Southern Pacific has 4,318,000 acres in northern California and western Oregon, and, with the Union Pacific, which controls it, millions of acres elsewhere. The Government, however, is now suing to annul title to the Southern Pacific lands in Oregon for noncompliance with the terms of the original grants. The Northern Pacific owns 3,017,000 acres of timberland and millions more of nontimbered land. The Weyerhaeuser Timber Co. owns 1,945,000 acres. In Florida, three holders have 4,200,000 acres, and the 182 largest timber holders have over 16,990,000 acres, nearly one-half the land area of the State. In the whole investigation area the 1,802 largest holdings of timber involve 79,092,000 acres of timberland, including a considerable acreage of timber rights in the Southern pine region, and in addition some of these holders own 10,652,000 acres lying in timbered parts, but not now bearing merchantable timber, not including Northern Pacific and Southern Pacific lands in nontimbered regions.

Finally, to timber concentration and to land concentration is added, in our most important timber section, a closely connected railroad domination. The formidable possibilities of this combination in the Pacific Northwest and elsewhere are of the gravest public importance.

THE FUTURE.

These are the facts of the lumber business in its most important feature, the natural supply. The paramount consideration remains still to be stated. There are many great combinations in other industries whose formation is complete. In the lumber industry, on the other hand, the bureau finds now in the making a combination caused, fundamentally, by a long-standing public policy. The concentration already existing is sufficiently impressive. Still more impressive are the possibilities for the future. In the last 40 years concentration has so proceeded that 195 holders, many interrelated, now have practically one-half of the privately owned timber in the investigation area, which contains 80 per cent of the whole. This formidable process of concentration, in timber and in land, certainly involves grave future possibilities of impregnable monopolistic conditions, whose far-reaching consequences to society it is now difficult to anticipate fully or to overestimate.

Such are the past history, present status, and apparent future of our timber resources. The underlying cause is our public-land policy, resulting in enormous loss of wealth to the public and its monopolization by a few interests. It lies before us now as a forcible object lesson for the future management of all the natural resources still remaining in the hands of the Government.

The facts given, the conclusions upon them, the menace which looms in the plain documentary recital of past policies, must give every citizen pause, and reemphasize to everyone the necessity of guarding at every point, and from all attacks whatsoever, the new and saving policy of conservation, which will put us in the way of national frugality upon the one hand and save us from the extortions of monopoly upon the other.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some telegrams.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. On what subject?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Principally, a telegram showing that Mason County, one of the large counties in my district, consisting of nearly 600,000 acres, received from the Forest Service last year, to help them pay their expenses, the sum of $24.65.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing certain telegrams. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The first telegram referred to is as follows:

SHELTON, WASH., June 5, 1913.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

In reply to your request, Mason County, which contains 930 square miles, or 585,200 acres of land, has received in 1913 the sum of $24.65 from the Forest Service. Not a great sum to help in the upkeep of this vast county, of which 165,722 acres are in the Olympic Forest Reserve. The sum of $24.65 will not go far toward building the county roads we need so badly and which cost $10,000 to $12,000 a mile in many localities. Kindly explain to leaders of all parties.

GRANT C. ANGLE.

The second telegram is as follows:

PORT TOWNSEND, WASH., June 4, 1913.

Hon. A. JOHNSON, Washington, D. C.:

Jefferson County, with an area of 1,747 square miles, or 1,078,400 acres, has 730,000 acres in the Olympic Reserve, and received from the Forest Service in 1912 the sum of $602. Area of assessed lands outside of reserve is but 280,000 acres.

H. L. HANSEN, Assessor.
Per T. S. S., Deputy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, comment is unnecessary. I favor conservation of a rational and practical kind and not for the dream-book kind which is filling up the libraries, the magazines, and the Government reports.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, June 10, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 10, 1913.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by Rev. W. V. Tudor, D. D., of the city of Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bacon	Fletcher	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bradley	Hollis	Oliver	Stephenson
Brady	James	Overman	Sterling
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Page	Stone
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Sutherland
Catron	Jones	Pomerene	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Ransdell	Thompson
Chilton	Lane	Reed	Thornton
Clapp	Lea	Robinson	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Shafroth	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
Crawford	McLean	Sherman	Williams
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Works

Mr. LEA. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I wish to state that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber on important business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the preceding session.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last.

Mr. CATRON. I ask that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CATRON. I ask unanimous consent that it be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I am compelled to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects. The Secretary will read the Journal.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent has been asked and refused

Mr. LEWIS. Under what parliamentary procedure may I renew the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not renew it.

Mr. LEWIS. It can not be renewed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only by unanimous consent, and that has been denied.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I was under the impression that my motion as a motion would take a little different order than a request. I understood that the previous procedure was a request, and that required unanimous consent. The distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] objected. I have now made a motion, and I fancied that did not require unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is mistaken. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I was in error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal must be read unless by unanimous consent it is otherwise directed. The motion is not in order. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the Journal.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the Journal will stand approved.

Mr. JONES. I desire a vote on the approval of the Journal. I object to its approval by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All in favor of the approval of the Journal will say "aye." [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. JONES. I call for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those who favor the approval of the Journal as read will please rise and stand until they are counted.

There were on a division—ayes 31.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will note the presence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not see why those of us who voted should be counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not counted any Senator who did vote.

Mr. NORRIS. I voted.

Mr. CATRON. And I voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs pardon. He supposed the Senators did not vote. A quorum is present; the ayes have it; and the Journal is approved.

Mr. JONES. I should like to have an announcement as to the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-one Senators voted in the affirmative, and about 20 Senators were present who declined to vote.

Mr. JONES. I do not desire to make any point of order against the presiding officer counting Senators present for a quorum, because I think that ought to be done.

Mr. STONE. I desire not to make a point of order but to make a protest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The protest will be noted.

Mr. STONE. I do not think that is a proper proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the first place, the Chair will state that there is no authority in our rules for this so-called division. That method of ascertaining the sentiment of a deliberative body comes to us from the Parliament of England, where the process of division is in the nature of a separation, and those who favor or oppose a certain proposition are required to leave the house and to return between tellers.

The system adopted of taking the judgment of the Senate by asking those who favor a proposition to rise and be counted, and then that those opposed to it shall rise is a sort of invention of presiding officers, and is intended to advise him whether or not the majority of those present favor or oppose a given question. The Chair has been unable to find any authority in our rules for this so-called division. It never was intended, in the judgment of the Chair, to be made the means of contributing to a filibuster movement. It is largely discretionary with the Chair, I should say, so far as the Chair is able to discover authority for it in the rules. The Chair without any hesitancy says that a quorum is present, and that the motion is adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to ask for a division of the Senate on the ruling of the Chair, but I simply want at this time to enter my protest against any such precedent being made in the Senate, so that there may be some record to show at a future time that there was an objection raised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The protest will be noted also.

Mr. STONE. If it would be a parliamentary inquiry, I should like to know whether under the ruling of the Chair it would be proper to count the hats of Senators in the cloakroom to see whether they were present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would rule that the inquiry of the Senator is frivolous and has no possible connection with this proceeding.

Mr. STONE. It is not frivolous. It was done in the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it has been done, it has not been done this morning, and the Chair is only dealing with the situation he finds here to-day. The Chair lays before the Senate——

Mr. STONE. Then the Chair declines to state whether, in his opinion, his ruling would extend to counting Members in the cloakroom.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course the Chair declines to make any such declaration as that, because it has no possible relation to the matter with which we are dealing.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, possibly this question may come up hereafter, and in order to have the RECORD absolutely clear I wish to make an inquiry: Would it be possible for the Chair to announce the vote as to the number of Senators voting aye, the number of Senators voting no, and the number of Senators present and not voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The opportunity has passed for the present. I am satisfied that Senators who are present and decline to vote would aid in that, and the Chair thinks it would be a proper thing to do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the RECORD should be clear on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection to that, except the fact that the Senator makes the inquiry too late, for some Senators may have come into the Chamber and others may have gone out.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I made it as soon as the opportunity was offered, and it was not a dilatory movement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is sure it was not, and the Chair does not so characterize the Senator's action; but he is only calling attention to the practical difficulty in the way, as some time has elapsed since.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly the Chair must have had some idea of the number of Senators present and not voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has a definite idea.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not question the accuracy of the Chair's recollection, but I should like to have the RECORD show something that would be an accurate statement, whether of fact or otherwise.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the attitude of the Chair on this question, but I suggest that there should be some record made in addition to the mere statement of the presiding officer that a certain number of Senators are present. It seems to me that the names of those present and not voting should be disclosed in the RECORD.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call just before this vote was taken disclosed the presence of 60 Senators, and the Chair relied somewhat on that roll call as a basis of the statement made, because there appeared to be no departures from the Senate up to that time. I agree with the Senator from California that there ought to be a record made disclosing the names of those who vote in the affirmative and those who vote in the negative and those present who decline to vote. On this particular occasion it would be difficult to do so now, because time has elapsed and Senators may have come and gone.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator from Kansas will pardon me a moment, I was not speaking particularly with reference to this special question, but as to what might happen in the future.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As to what may happen in the future it is not for the Chair now to determine.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, it is that when a division is called for the rising vote on it has the same effect as the viva voce vote; there is no record made of those present or absent, and it is simply a question of judgment with the Chair as to whether or not the motion is carried.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is it exactly.

Mr. BRISTOW. If a Senator wants to question the judgment of the Chair, he can resort to a roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is exactly right.

Mr. BRISTOW. That being the case, I see no reason why there should be an entry made as to the number present or absent. If it is the same as a viva voce vote and the Chair simply takes the rising vote in order to satisfy himself that his judgment in making the announcement was right, then a division is of no consequence.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. OLIVER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say that in the event I do not see fit to vote the Senate can order me to vote by a proper exercise of its authority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a question of the Senator voting. It is a question of the Senator being present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I declined to vote because there was such disturbance in the Senate that I was not able to distinguish what the Senate was trying to do. Half the time I can not hear from the seat I have here. I vote by guess sometimes. I will vote when I think I can make anything like an intelligent guess upon the question pending, but I am not blessed with acute hearing and have not been for some 20 years. My position here in the Senate is not extraordinarily good. It is not from any malicious intent that I refrained from voting, but only because ordinarily I desire to know upon what question I vote, and it requires more than ordinary vigilance here to discover what the question is a great part of the time. The acoustics of this Chamber must be bad and the disorder is much worse. It exceeds that of any legislative body I ever saw.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in view of the suggesion made by the Chair that some time has elapsed since the vote was taken, and that possibly some Senators may have left the Chamber, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Bacon	Goff	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bankhead	Gronna	Oliver	Stephenson
Bradley	Hollis	Overman	Sterling
Brady	James	Owen	Stone
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Sutherland
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Thomas
Catron	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Chamberlain	La Follette	Robinson	Thornton
Chilton	Lane	Saulsbury	Tillman
Clapp	Lea	Shafroth	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Sheppard	Walsh
Clarke, Ark.	McCumber	Sherman	Warren
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Shively	Weeks
Cummins	Myers	Simmons	Williams
Dillingham	Newlands	Smith, Ga.	Works

Mr. LEA. I desire to make the announcement that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CATRON. I present certain petitions in regard to the tariff, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. JONES. I did not understand the request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico requests that certain petitions which he has presented, having relation to the tariff, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. I will have to object to printing them in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects. The petitions will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Joint resolution by Senate and House of Maine Legislature, seventy-sixth session.

Whereas the tariff bill now pending in the National House of Representatives makes reductions in the tariff which seriously affect the products of the land, forest, and manufactories of Maine; and

Whereas in the opinion of the legislature the effect of such bill, if passed in its present form, will be to seriously injure the business of the State, and in effect is an unjust and unfair discrimination against its business interests: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of Maine protests against the present rate of reduction in the proposed tariff bill as an unfair and unjust discrimination against the State of Maine and its business interests; and further

Resolved, That we urge upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress that they use their best efforts to secure such modification in the proposed schedule as will put the business interests of this State upon an equal footing with those of all other States affected by the reductions in the tariff schedule; and further

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF MAINE,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, J. E. Alexander, secretary of state of the State of Maine, and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify:

That I have carefully compared the annexed copy of joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Maine in legislature assembled, with the original thereof as filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Maine, on the 12th day of April, 1913, and that it is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the State to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at Augusta, this 14th day of April, A. D. 1913, and in the one hundred and thirty-seventh year of the independence of the United States of America.

[SEAL.] J. E. ALEXANDER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (for Mr. BURLEIGH) presented resolutions adopted by the Friday Club, of Wayne; the Woman's Club, of Skowhegan; and of the Conklin Class, of Maine, all in the State of Maine, remonstrating against the transfer of the control of the national forests to the several States, which were referred to the Committee on Conservation of National Resources.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS OF LIQUORS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have a number of requests for copies of the message of ex-President Taft vetoing the so-called Webb-Kenyon liquor bill, together with the opinion of the Attorney General. For some reason that message and the opinion of the Attorney General were not printed. I send to the desk a copy and ask that it may be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks that a certain message of ex-President Taft and the accompanying opinion of the Attorney General be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I am compelled to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, Mr. President, I move that the document which I send to the desk be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that at the present time a motion of that kind can not be made, as the order of business is the presentation of petitions and memorials. It would require a suspension of that order to entertain the motion made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Will that motion be in order at the close of morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Oh, yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before that is finally decided I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that under the law itself certain requirements must be met before a paper can be printed as a public document. One of them is that there must be an estimate from the Public Printer as to the cost, and I do not believe that the motion would be in order without that information on hand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was under the impression that all messages from the President of the United States were printed as a matter of right, and that there was a regular fund provided for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, Mr. President, and I wondered why this document had not been printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 821. A bill authorizing the Secretary of War to relieve the Washington-Oregon Corporation, as far as he may deem advisable in the public interests, from certain conditions in an act entitled "An act granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad, and for telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington," approved August 9, 1912 (Rept. No. 60); and

S. 1808. A bill for the relief of Joseph L. Donovan (Rept. No. 61).

NATIONAL CONSERVATION EXPOSITION.

Mr. ASHURST. On behalf of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] I report favorably from the Committee on Industrial Expositions the bill (S. 2065) to provide for participation by the Government of the United States in the National Conservation Exposition to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., in the fall of 1913, and I submit a report (No. 62) thereon.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Industrial Expositions if a meeting of the committee was held to act upon this report?

Mr. ASHURST. The report is predicated upon the action of the committee. All the members of the committee but one were present, and the Senator from California will remember that he gave valuable attendance and assistance before the committee on this bill.

Mr. WORKS. To what does the bill relate, I will ask the chairman?

Mr. ASHURST. It is a bill appropriating $50,000 for the purpose of permitting the United States Government to make an exhibition at the Conservation Exposition at Knoxville, Tenn. The Senator will remember the bill.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; but the report has been so long coming in that I thought the Senator was making a report upon some other bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STONE. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I desire to report back with amendments House bill No. 1917, the Indian appropriation bill, and I submit a report (No. 63) thereon.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that the bill has been printed in the usual manner for the use of the Senate and is accessible to Members of the Senate, as is likewise the report. I desire to state further that the bill is one of the appropriation bills that failed at the last session, and hence it has become necessary to pass the bill at this session. It passed the House some weeks ago; the Committee on Indian Affairs has had it under consideration for some time, and has finally agreed upon the bill which I now report.

It is very important that the bill should be considered at once, for two reasons. The first is that the present fiscal year expires the last of this month, and unless the bill is passed there will be no available funds for carrying on the great Indian Bureau and of continuing the obligations of the Government after July 1.

Another reason is that the tariff bill, in all probability, will be reported to the Senate at a very early date, and because of the universal interest in that measure it is important that this appropriation bill should be disposed of. I will ask, Mr. President, that at the conclusion of the routine morning business the Indian appropriation bill may be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On to-day?

Mr. STONE. To-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business comes up to-day. Does the Senator desire to displace it?

Mr. STONE. No, sir. I understand the unfinished business does not come up until 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not remember the exact terms of the order, but thought it was to come up after the morning business had been concluded.

Mr. STONE. I looked at the order as printed on the calendar, which does not show anything except that the bill referred to by the Presiding Officer is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The entry on the printed calendar may not disclose the exact terms of the order upon which the bill was made the unfinished business. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is not in his seat at this time. The Senator from Missouri will proceed to state his request. Of course, the Chair will submit any request the Senator may make.

Mr. STONE. I have no wish to displace, or attempt to displace, the bill which was made the unfinished business; but I was laboring under the belief that it would not come up until 4 o'clock, and that in the meantime we might proceed with the Indian appropriation bill which I have in hand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was of the opinion that when the bill was made the unfinished business it was the intention of the Senate to take it up immediately upon the conclusion of the morning business without reference to whether or not the two hours had expired. Still, the language of the order will govern in that respect.

Mr. STONE. I read it only on the face of the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will examine the RECORD and see just exactly what was agreed to in that behalf.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, Senate bill No. 2258 was made the unfinished business, and was temporarily laid aside; so it takes its place as the unfinished business. I do not think it can be displaced by anything else. It is not made the unfinished business by consent; it is made so by motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A vote of the Senate would displace it.

Mr. STONE. There is no intention to displace it. The point is whether it comes up at the end of the morning hour; that is, at 4 o'clock, or sooner.

Mr. FLETCHER. It comes up immediately at the close of the morning business, I take it.

Mr. BACON. No, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless that was specified in the order, it would not.

Mr. BACON. It went over simply upon a motion to lay it aside, and it necessarily comes up at the expiration of the morning hour, which to-day will be 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read from the RECORD the proceedings had at the time unanimous consent was given.

The Secretary read from the RECORD of June 6, 1913, as follows:

> Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to let the bill go over for to-day. I thought I had the report, but I find I have it not. I have sent for it. If the Senator will allow the bill to go over to-day, I would be very grateful.
> Mr. FLETCHER. I will agree to that if I can get unanimous consent that the bill will be taken up immediately after the close of the morning business at the next session of the Senate and disposed of during that calendar day.
>
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida substitute that request for his motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time?
>
> Mr. FLETCHER. If the bill can now be taken up, I will ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until immediately after the morning business at the next session of the Senate, and that it be then taken up and considered and disposed of during that calendar day.
> Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think the Senate should be crowded in the consideration of this measure. So far as I am personally concerned, I believe it can be disposed of at the next meeting of the Senate, but I am not willing to mortgage out the time of the Senate in this way. I therefore object to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was made the unfinished business later on. In that state of the RECORD, if the RECORD speaks the truth, the unfinished business will not come up until 4 o'clock, and the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is entirely in order.

Mr. STONE. My recollection of the matter accords with the statement made from the Secretary's desk and with the statement made on the face of the calendar. I ask unanimous consent as soon as the routine morning business, the introduction of bills, reports, and so forth, is concluded, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LANE. There is an inquiry upon my part in respect to a clause or two in the bill, the disposal of which I am in ignorance of, and upon which I wish to have information before I will consent to its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LANE. I would until such time as I knew those facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a question about what the Senator will do. Does the Senator now object?

Mr. LANE. I will object to it until I know those facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon objects.

Mr. STONE. I will say to the Senator that of course I do not know to what clauses in the bill he refers, but in any event it is not open for discussion at this point. It would be out of order. When the bill is taken up and we reach the clauses referred to, the Senator can ask such questions as he may desire.

Mr. LANE. I go further than that. Unless I am informed as to what action has been taken upon the bill by the record I will question it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is as to granting unanimous consent as requested by the Senator from Missouri. Is there objection?

Mr. LANE. There is on my part.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon objects.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, notwithstanding the objection, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, subject to the right of the unfinished business.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word.

Mr. STONE. I withdraw the motion for the moment, and will make it later.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to say a word about this particular bill, and I hope the Senator from Oregon will listen to what I may have to say.

Mr. LANE. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Oregon knows——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A Senator can address the Senate on the motion submitted by the Senator from Missouri only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That motion has been withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects to debate on that motion.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish to address myself to that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The motion was withdrawn, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs pardon. Has the Senator from Missouri presented the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs that he announced he intended to submit?

Mr. STONE. Yes; I sent it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri presents the following report from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1917) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had hoped that the request of the Senator from Missouri for unanimous consent to consider the Indian appropriation bill would not be objected to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. JONES. Is this proceeding by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. JONES. I desire to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects to the Senator from North Dakota addressing the Senate at this time.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The following bills on the Secretary's desk have been read the first time, and will now be read a second time.

The SECRETARY. Senate bill 2440, by Mr. NELSON, providing for the erection of a suitable monument on the grave of Maj. Gen. Henry W. Lawton in Arlington National Cemetery, in the State of Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read a second time it will be referred——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not going to make the point that that is not a reading of the bill within the rule, except that I simply desire at this time to read the rule into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. JONES. I read paragraph 2 of Rule XIV:

> Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings previous to its passage, which readings shall be on three different days, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise; and the presiding officer shall give notice at each reading whether it be the first, second, or third.

I am not going at this time to make the point that the mere reading of the bill by title does not comply with that rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has already made that point, and the Chair has ruled that it was not well taken.

Mr. JONES. I had not made that point on the second reading of the bill, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course, the Chair stands corrected that far; but the Senator made it on the first reading, and the Chair is unable to draw a distinction as between the two readings. The Secretary will proceed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think I will bring this matter to the attention of the Senate. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington appeals from the decision of the Chair, holding that on the first and second readings of a bill the reading of the bill by title satisfies Rule XIV.

Mr. JONES. First, I desire to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Goff	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bacon	Gore	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Bradley	Hollis	Oliver	Smoot
Brady	Hughes	Overman	Stephenson
Bristow	James	Owen	Sterling
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Page	Stone
Catron	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones	Pomerene	Thomas
Chilton	Kern	Ransdell	Thompson
Clapp	La Follette	Robinson	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Saulsbury	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Lea	Shafroth	Vardaman
Crawford	Lewis	Sheppard	Weeks
Cummins	McCumber	Sherman	Williams
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Shively	Works
Fletcher	Myers	Simmons

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. KENYON] is absent from the city upon the business of the Senate. I make that announcement for the day, for every roll call which may occur.

Mr. LEA. I again announce the absence of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on official business of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent on official business. He is the chairman of the committee investigating the strike in West Virginia. He is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I make this statement to last during the continuance of that investigation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My colleague [Mr. WARREN] has been called from the Chamber on official business.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey] is absent from the city on official business, being engaged in the investigation of the strike situation in West Virginia. He is paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. This pair will continue during the absence of my colleague on that investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is a very important question, and one which it is of interest to the Senate to have settled in a way which will be satisfactory and in accordance with what may be to the best interest of the business of the Senate. It certainly ought not be settled along any partisan lines; and it is a question of such gravity that I think it ought to have more consideration than would be had upon simply a vote upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

I confess to very great difficulty in the matter myself. One of the gravest of the considerations which suggest themselves to my mind is that the rule draws no distinction between what is required as to the first reading, the second reading, or the third reading; and if the ruling of the Chair should become a precedent to be thereafter followed, it might be held that no bills could be read in full at any stage, and that the most important of all bills could be required to be voted upon without being read. I simply suggest that as one of the difficulties, without meaning now to discuss it.

What I rose to suggest was this: In view of the fact that this question has arisen, and that there is evidently a difference of opinion upon it, and in view of the grave consequences which may flow from a decision of it, especially under any circumstances which might give it a partisan tinge or complexion, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Washington if he will not withdraw his appeal and let this matter, under proper resolution, be referred to the Committee on Rules, and then come back to the Senate for its consideration and determination after proper examination. It is too grave a matter to be disposed of in this way.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that that will be entirely agreeable to me, because I suggested a moment ago that I did not care to raise the particular point at this time; but in view of the statement of the Chair I felt that the point ought to be brought to the attention of the Senate. The suggestion of the Senator from Georgia is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Washington will act upon that suggestion, I will undertake to see that there is introduced, either by myself or by some one else, such a resolution as will enable the matter to be referred to the Committee on Rules, and let it be carefully examined there, and come back to the Senate for consideration when it may not be in any manner influenced by any partisan considerations or by any questions which may now be uppermost in the minds of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is the judge of its own procedure, and can order as it pleases in such matters.

Mr. JONES. If it is possible to do so, on the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, I desire to withdraw the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws the appeal.

Mr. JONES. And I wish to express the hope that the Senator from Georgia will prepare a resolution of the character he has indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In making the ruling that was announced, the Chair did not act hastily or without a fixed opinion based upon examination.

This matter has been the subject of inquiry by judicial tribunals. Nearly all modern constitutions contain a provision that bills shall be read on three separate days. The crowded condition of the calendars of the various State legislatures has made it necessary to expedite their business in order to complete within the time usually limited the matters necessary to be disposed of; and they have fallen into the habit of reading bills by title on the first and second readings, when they are merely to be referred, and the journal has shown that.

The matter has been brought into controversy before the courts. Upon examining the reason upon which the practice rests the courts have readily reached the conclusion that a reading by title would satisfy such a provision. The Louisiana Supreme Court has made that decision. It is very true that the California Supreme Court decided otherwise, but the great preponderance of opinion is in favor of the proposition that a reading by title will answer the parliamentary purposes of the first and second reading of a bill.

Here we have habitually dispensed with the first and second reading absolutely without ever going through the formality of knowing what the text of the bill is. Under the circumstances the Chair believed that it was the intention of the makers of the rule that it should not be utilized for obstructing the business of the Senate, but on proper occasions to inform the Senate and to afford an opportunity to investigate the serious matters that were to be considered.

As it is always within the power of the Senate to have any paper, bill, or otherwise read upon the demand of the majority of the Senate, there seems to be no reason why the rule shall be given such a lax construction as would make it an efficient means of delaying the proceedings of the Senate.

The Chair has no pride of opinion about these matters. He is simply trying to do what seems to be consistent with the purposes for which the Senate is organized in carrying on its business. The Chair will not regard the withdrawal of the appeal as any accommodation to him.

Mr. BACON. In order that the matter may be correctly stated in the RECORD, I understand the ruling of the Chair substantially to be that dispensing with the reading of the bill does not require unanimous consent, but that the reading of a bill by title is sufficient, unless a majority of the Senate shall call for a full reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the ruling of the Chair. The bill will be read the second time by title.

The bill (S. 2440) providing for the erection of a suitable monument on the grave of Maj. Gen. Henry W. Lawton, in Arlington National Cemetery, in the State of Virginia, was read the second time by its title and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. JONES. Is that a bill introduced to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Washington if it is his purpose to object to the second reading of this bill?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection of the Senator from Washington is comprehensive, and without calling attention to each bill presented, the Secretary will read the bills the first time.

The SECRETARY. By the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON], a bill granting an increase of pension to Eugenia Chavez de Montano.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

The SECRETARY. By the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], a bill granting to the city and county of San Francisco certain rights of way in, over, and through certain public lands, the Yosemite National Park and Stanislaus National Forest, and certain lands in the Yosemite National Park, the Stanislaus National Forest, and the public lands in the State of California, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

The SECRETARY. By the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] a bill granting an increase of pension to W. H. Hyatt;

A bill granting a pension to Helena A. Edic; and

A bill granting an increase of pension to John Wade.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will go over.

The SECRETARY. By the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] a bill to regulate the employment of agents, counsel, and attorneys engaged to secure the passage or defeat of legislation by Congress; to prohibit persons and corporations interested in the passage or defeat of legislation, and their counsel, agents, and attorneys, from attempting to influence Members of the Senate and House of Representatives other than by oral and written arguments and briefs submitted to regularly constituted committees; providing for a return of expenses incurred, and prescribing penalties for the violation of the provisions thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I introduce the following bills.

Mr. JONES. I object to the introduction of the bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills under the objection of the Senator from Washington will go over for a day. The Secretary will read the bills by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska;

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act relative to recognizances, stipulations, bonds, and undertakings, and to allow certain corporations to be accepted as surety thereon," approved August 13, 1894; and

A bill to provide for the erection of a public building at Cedar City, Utah.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask if this reading of the bills will be considered as the first reading?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; that order will be relaxed, and the bills will be received, their introduction having been objected to.

Mr. BRADY. I present a private bill for the relief of William P. Havenor, which I understand the Senator from Washington will not object to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is a pension bill or a private-claim bill, it may be handed to the Secretary and will be referred. The Senator from Washington has indicated that he has no objection to bills taking that course if the Senator introducing them presents them at the desk.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present the following bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. LEWIS. I introduce a bill, to be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, under objection, will go over for a day. Are there further bills or joint resolutions?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have a bill which I desire to introduce, and I desire to make a brief statement in connection with it. It is a bill providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees. It represents the work of a committee consisting——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, is this discussion going on by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to object, as I objected to other Senators.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator that my purpose is simply to indicate that this bill is an enlargement of the Erdman Act.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to object to the discussion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It was prepared——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must state to the Senator from Nevada that the Senator from Washington has objected to the discussion of it. The Chair does not see any possible objection to the Senator from Nevada addressing himself briefly to the Senator from Washington, with a view of explaining the necessity of the measure and why he should make an exception in this case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is my purpose.

Mr. JONES. The Senator can not convince me that I should make an exception in this case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to make a statement to the Senator from Washington, with the hope that he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to object to a statement being made to me at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the face of the objection the Chair will state to the Senator from Nevada that debate at this time will not be in order. The Senator from Washington has announced definitely that he will not yield, and there is no way to do it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will offer this bill, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On objection, the bill will lie over for a day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I introduce a bill granting to the town of Nevadaville, Colo., the right to purchase certain lands for the protection of its water supply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado offers a bill, which, under objection, will go over for a day.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire as to the disposition of the resolution offered by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That comes up under another order.

Mr. BRISTOW. It will come up automatically.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will come up automatically when the present order of business has been concluded.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. THOMAS submitted an amendment conferring jurisdiction upon the United States Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment, with the right of appeal, as in other cases, in any action which may be brought in the court by any Indian nation, tribe, or band which has been recognized as such nation, tribe, or band by the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. WORKS submitted five amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the amendment was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas to the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, viz: Add as new sections after the end of line 6 on page 168 at end of section 2, the following:

"SECTION —. That upon each sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, or upon each purchase, agreement of purchase, or agreement to purchase of any cotton for future delivery, at or on any cotton exchange, or board of trade, or other similar place, or by any person acting in conformity to the rules and regulations of any such cotton exchange, board of trade, or other similar place, there is hereby levied a tax of one-tenth of 1 cent per pound in all cases where the cotton mentioned and described in such contract is not actually delivered, in good faith, in compliance with such contract, by the seller to the buyer therein respectively named. Any sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, or any purchase, agreement of purchase, or agreement to purchase of any cotton for future delivery at or on any cotton exchange, board of trade, or other similar place, or by any person acting in conformity to the rules and regulations of any such cotton exchange, board of trade, or other similar place, in any foreign country, where the order for such sale or purchase has been transmitted from the United States to such foreign country and either the buyer or the seller described in such contract of sale or purchase is at the time of the execution thereof a resident of the United States, shall be deemed and considered in all respects a sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, or a purchase, agreement of purchase, or agreement to purchase for future delivery of the cotton described therein within the meaning of this section, and shall be subject to the tax levied by this section. A corporation organized under the laws of any State or country shall be deemed for all purposes a person within the meaning of this section. All contracts for the sale or purchase as aforesaid of cotton for future delivery at the places and by the persons herein mentioned shall be in writing, plainly stating the terms of such contract, and indicating the parties thereto, and signed by the party to be charged by himself or his agent.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to make, prescribe, and publish all rules and regulations necessary to the enforcement of the foregoing section and to the collection of the tax thereby imposed. To further effect this purpose he is hereby authorized to require all persons coming within its provisions to keep such records and systems of accounting as will fully and correctly disclose the transactions in connection with which the said tax is authorized; and he may appoint such agents as he may deem necessary to conduct the inspection necessary to collect the tax herein authorized, and otherwise to enforce this statute and all rules and regulations lawfully made in pursuance thereof, as in his judgment may be required, and to fix the compensation of such agents.

SEC. —. That the tax authorized by the foregoing section — is hereby declared to be a lien upon the property of every cotton exchange, and upon the exchange membership of every member thereof, at which the contract for sales or purchases of cotton for future delivery mentioned in section — are made, and upon the property of every party to any contract for the sale or purchase of cotton for future delivery. Any cotton exchange, board of trade, or other similar place, or person acting in conformity with the rules and regulations of any such cotton exchange, board of trade, or other similar place where contracts for the sale or purchase of cotton for future delivery are made, and every person who shall be a party to such contracts of sale or purchase as mentioned and described in section — who shall fail to pay, or shall evade, or attempt to evade, the payment of the tax levied in section —, or shall otherwise violate this statute or any rule or regulation lawfully made in pursuance thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine in any sum not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000; and in case of natural persons or unincorporated associations of persons violating this act an additional punishment by imprisonment for not less than one year nor more than three years may be imposed, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. —. That the payment of the tax levied under authority of section — shall not exempt any person from any penalty or punishment now or hereafter provided by the laws of any State for entering into contracts for the future delivery of cotton; nor shall the payment of taxes imposed by said section — be held to prohibit any State or municipality from imposing a tax on the same transaction.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. KERN. I ask for the adoption of the following order with reference to committee assignments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a privileged matter presented by the Senator from Indiana which the Secretary will read.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, Senator from Illinois, be appointed a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Senator THORNTON therefrom.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That Senator GORE be assigned to the place on the Committee on Interstate Commerce made vacant by the resignation of Senator THOMAS therefrom.

That Senator THOMAS be assigned to the place on the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands made vacant by the resignation of Senator GORE therefrom.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BACON. I desire to give notice that during the session of the next legislative day of the Senate, or, on a later day, I will offer an amendment as follows to the second paragraph of Rule XIV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to wit:

At the conclusion of the said second paragraph of said Rule XIV, strike out the period and insert a semicolon in lieu thereof, and add the following proviso to be thereafter a part of said second paragraph, to wit:

"Provided, That the first or second reading of each bill or joint resolution may be by title only, unless the Senate in any case shall otherwise order."

INHABITED ALLEYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WORKS. I submit a resolution which under the present practice of the Senate I suppose will go over until to-morrow. I give notice that I will desire to take it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 107), as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate the names, residences, and occupations of all persons owning and renting houses or rooms within what are known and designated as the "inhabited alleys" of the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects, and the resolution goes over.

TABLE OF IMPORTS.

Mr. SMOOT. I have received so many letters asking for information as to the amount of importation, whether free or dutiable, and the equivalent ad valorems upon the dutiable amount, that I have had prepared a table showing the importation for the years 1907——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, is this proceeding by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah has not stated for what purpose he arose. As soon as the Chair learns what he desires to do he can answer the question of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. I intend to ask unanimous consent for the printing of this table. Does the Senator from Washington object?

Mr. JONES. I do. I desire to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if I am in order I rise to move that the resolution——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington has suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on May 29, 1913, approved and signed the following joint resolution:

S. J. Res. 30. Joint resolution extending the leave of absence of Mrs. A. E. Grant.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAILROAD CO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 105, submitted by Mr. KENYON on the 5th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission investigate, if it has not the evidence on hand, and report to the Senate all the facts and circumstances concerning the purchase of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. and the subsequent receivership of both railroads; such information to contain the amount paid per share for both common and preferred stock of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co.; the time of the issuance of such stock and the amount thereof; guaranties, if any, made with reference thereto; amount of the bonds issued by the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. at the time of the purchase of the said Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad; the location of the holders of said bonds; the amount of the same held in this country and abroad; and all the facts and circumstances involved in any way in the transactions between said railroad companies; and all the facts and circumstances leading up to said receiverships, and the progress of said receiverships to date; also the names and the capitalization and bond issues of all railroad or bridge companies controlled by said St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co.; the time of such acquisitions, how acquired, amount of bonds issued at the time of such acquisitions; and all facts or circumstances involved in such purchase or control.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, regarding this resolution, which was offered by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], I wish to say that I have interviewed the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and he thinks it desirable that this investigation should be had. I hope that it will result in some recommendations to Congress regarding the federation of State railroads into one organization for the purpose of engaging in interstate commerce.

The St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Co. is both an operating and a holding company, organized under the laws of Missouri. Under its charter some 50 or 60 railroads of varying length, in various States, have been gathered together into one great organization, covering a mileage of about 7,500 miles, for the purpose of more effectively engaging in interstate transportation.

I have long been of the view, Mr. President, that Congress should legislate upon this subject in such a way as to provide either a national incorporation law, with a view to uniting in one ownership noncompetitive railways that are intended to engage on a large scale in interstate transportation, or some law providing for national holding companies under which such a union of railroads can be accomplished. As it is, we find that though the purpose these railroads have in their union is interstate and national, yet the law under which this purpose is accomplished is a State and not a national law. Thus we have the evil of the laws of different States authorizing the formation of holding companies, with insufficient restrictions as to capitalization and with insufficient control as to their operation.

This practice has been recognized, and almost all the great systems of railway, instead of being unionized or federated under a national law, have been unionized or federated under State laws. As a consequence, we have a great laxity regarding the capitalization of these holding companies and regarding the issue of stocks and bonds. In this case the railroad capitalization in stock and bonds for these 7,500 miles of railway aggregates nearly $75,000 a mile, which would appear to be a very large aggregate when we consider the character of the country through which these railways run.

I hope that the Interstate Commerce Commission will take up this question, and, under the power of recommendation given to that commission by the organic law, that they will make some suggestion to Congress regarding national legislation that will cure this evil; that will furnish national machinery for unionizing the railroads for national purposes, and which will contain proper restraints against excessive capitalization.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Secretary what business has transpired since the last roll call. [A pause.] The Secretary informs the Chair that there have been numerous bills introduced. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Goff	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Bacon	Gore	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bankhead	Gronna	Owen	Stephenson
Bradley	Hollis	Page	Sterling
Brady	James	Perkins	Stone

Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Md.

Mr. LEA. I again announce the absence of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on important public business. I make that announcement for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The announcement of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] will account for the absence of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], is absent from the Senate on important business.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BRYAN] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I make that announcement for the day.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent on public business. I will let that announcement stand for the remainder of the day.

Mr. WEEKS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is unavoidably absent. I make that announcement for the day. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the remarkable performance of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which he has been carrying on here to the absolute disgust of every Senator on the floor for nearly a week, is predicated, as we all understand, upon the failure of the Senate to adopt a resolution giving him an additional $1,200 clerk. That is a most grievous thing and a great public wrong which no doubt justifies this remarkable and most unusual action on the part of the Senator from Washington. With a view to ending this farce, I am going to make the proposition that if the Senator from Washington will prepare a subscription paper, I will get one of the pages to circulate it among Senators, and I think we can raise——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from Missouri is bordering pretty closely upon a violation of the rules of the Senate, and the Chair suggests that he take notice of that fact.

Mr. STONE. I think we can raise enough to pay a clerk for six months, and then go on with the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

The resolution was agreed to.

ARMOR PLATE FOR VESSELS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, some weeks since I introduced a resolution, being Senate resolution No. 78, directing the Secretary of the Navy to transmit certain information to the Senate with reference to the cost of armor plate for the last 25 years. I simply rise to ask unanimous consent that that resolution be taken from the table, where it now lies, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not require unanimous consent to refer to a committee a bill or resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be so referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked by the Senator from Arizona for the reference of Senate resolution No. 78 to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JONES. I do not understand that it requires unanimous consent to do that. I object to the unanimous-consent proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona move that the resolution be referred to the committee?

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Washington objects to unanimous consent being given——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects to unanimous consent.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that Senate resolution 78 be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona moves that Senate resolution 78 be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to be heard for just a moment. I rose to make this motion because I believe the resolution should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It has been lying upon the table for some time. That was my primary motive. My secondary motive was to see if I could draw forth an objection from the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. The personal friendship existing between himself and myself is very close. I value his friendship highly, and I believe he has shown himself to be a good Senator until very recently.

Mr. President, the man who wastes his money is not a useful man in business; the man who wastes his substance is not a useful man in the economy of the Nation; but the man who wastes his time——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. I decline to yield, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona declines to yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The man who wastes his time wastes his life, because a human life is made up of time. The man who wastes his own time does himself an injury, while the man who wastes not only his own time but the time of other people does a grave injustice to other people and approaches the frontier line of culpability very closely. I desire in a spirit of friendship to say that I believe when the Senator from Washington reflects upon his conduct and observes that he is not only wasting his own time but the time of the ambassadors from 48 sovereign States, called here under the Constitution to deal with the complex and ever-present propositions of State and National sovereignty and the destinies of 90,000,000 people, he will realize that the time of these ambassadors, these Senators, should not be wasted in frivolity. We should be about the business of the people. We should be attending to our duties. I hope the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will no longer continue this filibuster, which does no credit to the Senate and reflects no credit upon himself. The Senator should not resort to such a method except in defense of a vital principle.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I tried to interrupt the Senator in order to save the valuable time of the many ambassadors who are here by the suggestion to him that I did not oppose his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona that Senate resolution No. 78 be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

Whereas bids were opened by the Secretary of the Navy in February, 1913, for furnishing armor plate for the dreadnought Pennsylvania; and

Whereas the representatives of three firms manufacturing armor plate in the State of Pennsylvania, while pretending to bid as competitors, after a conference submitted bids which did not vary more than $1 per ton; and

Whereas the then Secretary of the Navy, notwithstanding an intimation made on the floor of the Senate of the United States that it was alleged there existed collusion among different manufacturers to advance the price of armor plate and divide the profits of the contract, awarded the contract on March 3, 1913, by dividing, for all practical purposes, the award of 8,000 tons of armor plate among the three companies; and

Whereas it is alleged that this action of the said firms reveals that they comprise an armor-plate trust, and that the price named in the contract awarded by the Secretary of the Navy is in the neighborhood of about $25 per ton higher than the previous awards by the Department of the Navy for armor plate: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to forward to the Senate, at as early a date as practicable, a report on the amount of armor plate ordered by the Department of the Navy during the past 25 years, the prices paid in each award, and the names of the firms or corporations to whom the contracts were awarded.

INVESTIGATION OF ATTEMPTS TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate resolution 102.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reports a resolution, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 102) submitted by Mr. OVERMAN on the 5th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of the investigation of the charge of a "lobby being maintained in Washington" ordered by the Senate under resolution of May 29, 1913, be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary or the chairman of the subcommittee thereof.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the resolution reported by him may be considered at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand the Senator from Washington to object to the request?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is a resolution to pay the expenses of the committee that is trying to find a lobby. Think of that!

Mr. JONES. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that probably it would not be out of place for these honorable Senators to pay out of their own pockets whatever expense may be attached to the investigation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him why he objects?

Mr. JONES. I have been objecting to almost every request for unanimous consent to-day, and I do not feel that I should make an exception in this case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator tell me why he is objecting to nearly everything to-day?

Mr. JONES. I have too much confidence in the high intelligence of my friend from Mississippi to believe that he does not know why these objections are being made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been informed that this objecting business began at the last session of the Senate, when I was not here, and really I have been informed that the Senator is holding up the Senate and the country because he wants an additional clerk for certain Senators. Is that the case?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not holding up the Senate. I am simply asking that these matters be conducted according to the rules of this honorable body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But do I understand that really, now, under it all, as a matter of "honest-Injun" truth, as they say down South, the real reason why the Senator is holding up the business of 90,000,000 of people is because he wants certain Senators to have additional clerks, and that until the Senate consents to that he will not consent to having the Senate do business?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, of course, I do not know what the understanding of the Senator from Mississippi is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was not asking for my understanding, Mr. President. I was asking the Senator for his. Mr. President, going back something like——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, is this proceeding by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi is addressing the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. I desire to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the Senator why he objects to my talking?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects. Debate is out of order. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

MINNESOTA RATE CASES (S. DOC. NO. 54).

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 108), as follows:

Resolved, That the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Minnesota Rate cases Nos. 291, 292, and 293, George T. Simpson et al., appellants, v. David C. Shepard et al., decided June 9, 1913, be printed as a document, and that 10,000 additional copies thereof be printed for the use of the Senate folding room.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I consider this a very important matter, and I am not going to object if the Senator will change the language so as to provide that these documents shall be distributed so that each Senator will get his proportional part. I do not know whether that would be done under the resolution or not.

Mr. FLETCHER. That would follow under the resolution.

Mr. JONES. I understand from some Senators that that would not follow.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the resolution that would not follow. As I understand, the copies are to be printed for the use of the Senate and would go to the document room.

Mr. FLETCHER. First there would be printed 1,000 copies, which would be prorated among the Senators as every document is; then the extra copies would go to the document room.

Mr. JONES. But I wish the extra copies to be allotted to Senators, because every Senator will have a great many requests for these important decisions. I think they ought to be apportioned among the Senators and not simply given to the first persons who go there and apply for them. If the Senator will amend his resolution so as to meet that situation, I shall have no objection whatever.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that his resolution be modified so as to provide that the 10,000 additional copies shall go to the folding room; then every Senator will get his pro rata of the number. If they go to the document room Senators will get them as they call for them.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the word "document" be changed to "folding," so that the resolution will provide that the 10,000 copies shall go to the folding room.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida asks to strike out the word "document" and insert the word "folding." Unless there is objection, that will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I understand the question now is upon the adoption of the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to be heard in some very relevant remarks in regard to that question.

A moment ago I asked the Senator from Washington why he was holding up the business of the Senate and of the country, and obtained no reply except a sort of a defiance hurled at me, inviting me to make a reply for myself. That left me to guess at what his intentions were. I had much preferred to have had him state why he was holding up the business of the country. He leaves me, therefore, to draw my own inference.

Something over 100 years ago Patrick Henry described American women as standing upon the tiptoe of expectancy, waiting to hear of American defeats or victories. He then described the American soldiery as in full panoply of war, fighting for liberty against British oppression. After drawing a picture of all America at that day at a very acute stage, he said that there was hurled at the ear of night the hoarse voice of one John Hook, who was screaming through the American Army, "Beef!" "Beef!" "Beef!"

I have never seen anything come much nearer a reproduction of that picture than what is going on now. Here are the sworn representatives of 90,000,000 people, expected to attend to the public business and to expedite it to the best of their ability, when there is hurled upon the startled ear of night the hoarse voice of the Senator from Washington, or perhaps the hoarse voice of a parrot somewhere, exclaiming, "JONES wants a clerk!" "JONES wants a clerk!" "JONES wants a clerk!"

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] comes into the Chamber and tries to fix the annual relations between us and the only native American men in this country—to get a hearing for the Indian appropriation bill—and there comes an objection to everything. Somebody asks why, and echo answers: "JONES wants a clerk!" "JONES wants a clerk!" "JONES wants a clerk!"

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word, and I will. Then——

Mr. JONES. It is right at this point that I wish to make an observation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. JONES. I simply wanted to say that evidently the Senator from Mississippi had not answered the call of the Senate and was not here when the objection was made, because the objection did not come from the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; then I have only made a mistake about the incident and none as to the soul of the proceeding. If somebody else had not objected, I suspect the Senator from Washington would have objected.

But that is not all. There steps into the Senate the Senator from Mississippi, desirous of making brilliant remarks relevant to public issues, and he is silenced, too; and the gentle shepherd asks why, and echo answers: "Because JONES wants a clerk!" "JONES wants a clerk!" "JONES wants a clerk!"

Mr. President, since John Hook went through the American Army, disregardful of all the great acute crises of patriotism surrounding him, screaming "Beef!" "Beef!" "Beef!" nothing precisely like this has presented itself to the American people. We can not do a thing; we can scarcely get this body adjourned to go out and attend the meetings of subcommittees; we can not prepare tariff bills, because we must be here to see what is going on; and no business can be done on the floor of the Senate because the Senator from Washington wants a clerk.

I served in the other House with the Senator from Washington. I served with him here. I am very fond of him. But I really do think he is making too much of a big thing about his wanting a clerk. That it is a large thing, I have no doubt. That it is of immense importance, I have no doubt. That it is a national issue, I have no doubt. But I do contend that it is not so great a national issue as attending to the people's business day by day.

Mr. President, in my opinion there is a sacred right to filibuster now and then when a great cause is at stake, when a great principle is at stake, when a people's civilization is at stake, when something that is vital is up for consideration, and when it is desired that legislative action shall be held back until the American people can take due notice and instruct their representatives. But this is the first time in my life I have ever known the entire business of the country to be held up by a one-man filibuster, with no rhyme nor reason in it except the constant iteration and reiteration of the phrase "JONES wants a clerk!" I submit to my friend from Washington that the issue is entirely too small, that the amount in the pot is entirely too little for the ante demanded in order to play the game.

It does not concern these 90,000,000 people whether the Senator from Washington gets an additional clerk or not. It is a secondary matter; in fact, I might say it is a sort of tertiary matter. They are paying money every day for him and me and everybody else to stay here and attend to public business. For the last three sessions of this body they have been paying whatever it costs this body to carry on a day's proceedings multiplied by three in order that he might impress the Senate with the idea that he needed and ought to have a clerk, and perhaps that some other Senators needed and ought to have clerks.

That is not all, Mr. President. I was once in the minority myself, strange as it may seem. In fact, I have an indistinct recollection of spending about 16 years in the minority, on the other side of this Capitol and on this. For some time upon this side I had two clerks. All of us had two clerks. I heard no hoarse voice startling the dull ear of night and proclaiming that it was a matter of the highest importance that I should be given one more clerk; and yet I dare say there never was a day during the time I was in the minority when I did not have just as much work to do as the Senator from Washington has to do now.

I submit that this is too small a matter to be brought into the arena in this manner; that the great semirevolutionary right of filibustering, in order to rivet public attention upon a great question, should not be made ridiculous by being brought down to this sort of level. I am astonished at it more because it comes from the Senator from Washington than if it had come from almost anybody else in this body, because he has a sense of humor; he has a sense of proportion; and he ought to have seen the discrepancy between the necessity of carrying on the great business of a great people upon the one hand and the small question of JONES wanting a clerk upon the other. I hope he will put an end to it by his own free and voluntary action and let the representatives of the people in the Senate of the United States proceed with the public business.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I can not help but think about the great proposition of filling some post offices that animated the Senator from Mississippi not very many months ago in holding up the business of the Senate in order that some of his friends might get hold of them. But I am not going to subject myself, in answering him, to the further criticism of my friend from Arizona as to wasting the time of these ambassadors. It seemed to me that I should rise at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi and suggest that we have been wasting now for probably 15 or 20 minutes the important time of these great ambassadors. And, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before that is——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington having suggested the absence of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Bacon	Goff	Myers	Smoot
Bradley	Gore	Newlands	Stephenson
Bristow	Gronna	Norris	Sterling
Burton	Hollis	O'Gorman	Stone
Catron	James	Page	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Thomas
Chilton	Jones	Ransdell	Thompson
Clapp	Kern	Robinson	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Shafroth	Weeks
Crawford	Lea	Sheppard	Williams
Dillingham	Lewis	Sherman	Works
Fall	McLean	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The resolution was agreed to.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN RAILROAD COMPANIES AND EMPLOYEES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the bill which I offered during the morning hour with reference to mediation, conciliation, and arbitration between railroad companies and their employees be printed in the RECORD with the statement that this bill was prepared by a committee consisting of five of the presidents of the great railway systems of the country, five of the representatives of the various railroad organizations, such as the locomotive engineers, railroad trainmen, and so forth, and five of the representatives of the Civic Federation, and this bill represents their work in the improvement and enlargement of the Erdman Act. Acting in cooperation with this committee were the Chief Justice of the Commerce Court, Judge Knapp, and the Commissioner of Labor, Mr. Neill.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to make a motion that the bill be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether that motion is in order. I have always understood that when documents were printed in the RECORD it was done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate can control almost anything by a majority vote, unless a limitation is found in the rules.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that this is a matter of great interest not only to all the railway employees in the country but all railway officials and to the public at large, for we all know that serious controversies are now pending between the railways and their employees regarding wages, and it is desirable that a system of conciliation should be speedily perfected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nevada that the hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2258) to extend the proposed reorganization of the customs service for a period of two years.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. President, if I can get the floor, I should like to renew the motion I have just made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The effect of the adoption of the Senator's motion would be to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a few minutes. I do not believe it will take very long to dispose of this bill. It is the unfinished business, and I would not like to have it displaced.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator from Washington will not interpose an objection, and I can have unanimous consent, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator from Florida would not like to have the unfinished business displaced.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not see why it should displace the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. It will displace it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent without displacing the unfinished business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask, then, without displacing the unfinished business, unanimous consent for the insertion of the bill, with the accompanying statement, in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. There is no doubt but that the bill and statement will be printed all right, but I can not, to use a common expression, "play any favorites" in this matter. So I shall have to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the unfinished business will be proceeded with.

REORGANIZATION OF THE CUSTOMS SERVICE.

The Senate, as in committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2258) to extend the proposed reorganization of the customs service for a period of two years, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the time for the performance by the President of the acts and things authorized to be done and performed by him under the provisions of chapter 355 of the Statutes at Large, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, in so far as these relate to the reorganization of the customs service, shall be extended until January 1, 1914.

That estimates submitted in compliance with such provisions shall be on account of the second half of the fiscal year 1914, and the reorganization ordered by such provision shall constitute for the second half of the fiscal year 1914, and until otherwise provided by Congress, the permanent organization of the customs service: Provided, That the estimates to be submitted therefor shall show a reduction in the total cost of such service per annum to an amount not in excess of the amount actually expended for such service in the fiscal year 1913, less $500,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, since our last meeting I have been trying to find out the real necessity for the passage of this bill, and up to the present time I have been unable to learn of any good reason why it should be passed.

In the first place, I am informed that there is time to put in operation the change as provided in the reorganization plan submitted by President Taft. The statement was made that there was not time in which to make the reorganization and that is one of the first questions that I asked for information. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that if the Senate should fail to pass this bill the reorganization could be made by the 1st day of July of this year.

I notice in the change of collection districts that at present the number is 124, and as reorganized the number will be but 49, and that of the ports of entry, subports of entry, and ports of delivery in charge of surveyors of customs and deputy collectors the number will be reduced from 337 to 269, or a total reduction from 461 to 318.

The Senate will notice that the reductions consist mostly in the elimination or the consolidation of the collection districts. For instance, in Maine there are to-day 14 collection districts. Under the reorganized plan there will be but 1 district, and that district will not only include all the 14 districts of Maine, but it will include New Hampshire as well.

I notice also that there are a number of cities in Maine that will be ports of entry, but not with a collector in charge. A deputy collector will have charge of the particular port of entry. The only collector who will be appointed under the reorganized plan is the collector who will be located at Portland, Me. However, all the work that has been done formerly by the collectors will now be done by the deputy collectors under the direction of the collector of the Maine district.

In looking at the reorganization, I can not see where it is going to seriously affect any State in the Union. It is true that a number of cities will not be classed a collection district, with a collector in charge, as now provided, but those districts will have a deputy collector who will perform the duties the collector is performing to-day, and it will save to the Government just that much money.

As I stated, there have been added a number of cities which will be subports of entry where to-day there are none, and it will be an advantage, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah yields.

Mr. WORKS. I suppose that in all places where there were collectors of customs before there will still be maintained an office in charge of a deputy.

Mr. SMOOT. A deputy collector.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah whether he has determined what would be the saving of expense in that case. There will probably be just as many officers at those ports as there were before. There may be some little difference in the amount of the salaries to be paid, but that will be about all. Has the Senator made any calculation as to the actual saving?

Mr. SMOOT. As I stated before, the greatest saving will be in the salaries of the collectors themselves. I pointed to Maine as only an instance. To-day there are in the State of Maine 14 collectors, but under the revised plan there will be but 1 collector.

Mr. WORKS. I understand, Mr. President, but I do not understand whether that will in fact reduce the number of employees in that office. A deputy may be paid as much as a collector of customs is paid for like services. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. SMOOT. Then let me say this to the Senator: Take Bangor, Me. To-day Bangor, Me., has a collector and at the same city there is a deputy collector, whereas under the reorganized plan there will not be a collector, because the collector will be located at Portland, Me., but the deputy collector will still be maintained at Bangor, Me.

Mr. WORKS. And will there be maintained additional help at that office under the deputy?

Mr. SMOOT. The report implies that the work done at Bangor, Me., by the collector, deputy collector, and his assistant can be done by the deputy collector and his assistants just as well. That is one of the greatest savings in the reorganization. In other words, there are in the present organization 124 collectors, and in the reorganization there will be but 49, or a saving of the salaries of 75 collectors. I will read to the Senator——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator seems to be proceeding on the assumption that the bill is to annul absolutely and destroy entirely the effect of the order promulgated by President Taft. I do not so understand it at all. I am, in a way perhaps, invading the function of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], but being a member of the committee that reported the bill, I understand it does not annul the order made by the President. It simply extends the time in which the consolidation of customs districts may be made effective. It extends the time until the 1st of next January. It does not prevent consolidation from being made to-morrow or from being made next week if the conditions are all right for it. There are some complications in some of the districts which it will take a little time to adjust, and on that account the report from the Secretary of the Treasury to the committee was to the effect that an extension until the 1st of next January should be allowed.

So it seems to me the Senator is proceeding on the erroneous assumption that the bill proposes to annul an order made by the President.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The statement of the Senator from South Dakota bears directly upon a question I was going to ask the Senator from Florida. It occurred to me in looking over this whole matter that there was nothing to extend the time for.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The report indicates that the adjustment in some of the districts will take some little time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know; but those are matters for future consideration. The sundry civil appropriation act, which provided for the action of the President, told what the President should do. The President has done that. There is no need of an extension of time for that. Now, what is the extension of time for? That is the question I wanted to put to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall be very glad to answer when I get an opportunity.

Mr. SMOOT. I will allow the Senator to answer the question. I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. As the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] has indicated, it is not at all the effect of the bill to undo all that has been done. There is not any claim made by the friends of the bill that the plan in a general way is not satisfactory to the department at present, nor is there any intention here to destroy or upset or uproot that plan. The only purpose of the bill is to extend the time for the performance of the acts required of the President under the act of 1912 until January 1, 1914, not with the idea that the department is opposed to the plan or altogether opposed to the order of President Taft.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator does not get my notion. The query in my mind was this: At the last Congress we devolved certain duties upon the President of the United States, giving a period within which those duties were to be performed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; he was was to report at the next regular session.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. At any rate, we devolved certain duties upon the President of the United States requiring him to do certain things. Now, he has done those things. They were done two months ago.

Now, can we extend by a bill in this form the doing of a thing which has been consummated two months ago? That was the query in my own mind, and it is the query I wanted to present to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I see the point suggested by the Senator from Wyoming. It seems to me beyond any question if Congress had the power to vest this power in the President, it has the power to continue that same authority in the President—not in the individual, but in the office.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think there is no question but that we would have the right to give new authority, but the authority we have already given having been concluded, can we extend that same authority or must we give new authority?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that can be done, and I think it is done by this bill beyond any question. Under the act approved August 24, 1912, the President was authorized to do certain things, and it was provided that "such reorganization shall be communicated to Congress at its next regular session." The President did communicate to Congress, as the Senator has said, his order reorganizing the customs service. That order has not gone into effect. It will not go into effect until the 1st of July. It is still in suspense, as it were. The whole reorganization plan and system as outlined by that order is still in the control of Congress.

Congress is now asked to pass an act which shall continue that power and authority, as provided under the act of 1912, until January 1, 1914. It recognizes what has been done up to this time and, without attempting to destroy what has been done, provides means whereby if there are any irregularities or any inconsistencies to be corrected or any further desirable changes to be made the President will have an authority to do it within that time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My query was not directed as to whether the thing ought to be done or whether a change ought to be made or not. My query to the Senator from Florida was that having done a thing and completed it, so far as the authority which we conferred indicated, can we extend the time for further work upon a thing that is already completed?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think undoubtedly that can be done by an act of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am sure it can be done by an act of Congress, but can it be done by extending the time as this bill provides?

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me there can be no question about that, since, as I say, the plan of reorganization has not yet gone into effect.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator from Florida, while he is on his feet, for what reason does the Senator ask that the time be extended from July 1, 1913, until January 1, 1914?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, Mr. President, that while the plan provided for in the Executive order generally meets with the approval of the department, and is, broadly speaking, a wise, economical, and efficient plan, there are certain objections to it, more or less local in their nature, based, as the Secretary indicates, perhaps, on a kind of misapprehension in certain localities; and it is intended to give an opportunity for those matters to be adjusted and rearranged. The objections are not to the plan as a whole; they do not go to the idea of reorganization, but to some specific provision of the scheme proposed. It is desirable that they may be adjusted, and that such other changes may be made in the plan as may seem wise.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida another question. Is it not an absolute fact that the reason for wanting the time extended for six months is because under the reorganization a great many collectors will be displaced on July 1, 1913?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not, Mr. President. I can understand, of course, the intimation; but I will say to the Senator that I was present at the hearing which the President afforded in the East Room of the White House on this plan as submitted to him by the Secretary of the Treasury. There were objections raised to the plan from, I should say, more than half the States on the Atlantic seaboard, from more than half the States on the Gulf, and from more than half the States on the Pacific by their representatives there present.

Mr. SMOOT. That was done on the ground of local pride, was it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. There were various objections made. Of course I could not undertake to enumerate the objections in all their detail; but there were representatives of these different important communities and ports; members of boards of trade, business men, and others present who were protesting against the whole plan of reorganization.

I am frank to say to the Senator that, so far as I am concerned, I do not believe, as relating to Florida, there was any need of reorganization at all. I am quite sure that Florida is entitled to more than one collector of customs for that State. Under this plan the whole State of Florida is made into one district, which embraces also portions of the State of Georgia, including the St. Marys River and St. Marys, and the headquarters of the district would be 500 miles from the chief port of entry on one side, 400 miles in another direction, and over 400 miles to another port.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must know that it is not going to affect any city in Florida, with the exception perhaps of the appointment of one collector in a number of cities, for there is not one of the cities of Florida that will not have a deputy collector. Every city will be able to do business exactly the same after the 1st of July as it is doing to-day. The only way the bill affects Florida in any way, shape, or form that I can see is that it gives her one collector instead of eight collectors, which she has to-day.

Mr. President, I could call the Senator's attention to the amount of business which is done at each one of these cities, and if the question arises for the Senate to decide whether they think it is proper to have a collector and a deputy collector in several of the cities I can do so; but I will name one city, so that the Senator will understand the point I am making. I will take, for instance, Pensacola, Fla.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there ought to be a collector of customs at Pensacola.

Mr. SMOOT. Why should there be a collector of customs at Pensacola and also a deputy collector?

Mr. FLETCHER. There ought to be a collector of customs there because Pensacola is an important port on the Gulf, with one of the most splendid harbors in the country. The importations are of considerable moment to Pensacola, and to require the people who have to deal with the customhouse to deal with a deputy at that port or else go 400 miles to Jacksonville, for instance, to deal with the collector himself is not, I submit, quite the thing to do.

In the first place, I do not believe there is any saving of consequence as to the dollars-and-cents proposition and there is not certainly any advantage as to efficiency.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that case I do not believe there will be one appeal out of a thousand made from a deputy collector to a collector who is 400 miles away.

Let us come down to another city. We will take the city of Apalachicola, for instance. What reason can the Senator give why there should be a collector and a deputy collector at Apalachicola, when all the money that is collected from the dutiable as well as the free list is $1,010 per annum? Yet there are at Apalachicola a collector and a deputy collector.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would say, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, just in that connection, that this bill does not involve the question which the Senator from Utah seeks to raise here. The passage of this bill leaves the matter where it is at present, with only one collector in Florida, subject only to such changes as the President may see fit to make through the Department of the Treasury between now and the 1st of January. It does not absolutely repeal the order which the President has already made or restore the former condition, but it leaves that order in effect so far as it has gone, subject, as I say, to such revision as the President may make. So the questions the Senator raises here are questions which will be considered upon any application to restore Apalachicola, for instance, as a port with a collector.

So far as Florida is concerned, I may say that I believe there ought also to be a collector of customs at Tampa, where nearly two million dollars of revenue come into the Government—$1,800,000.

Mr. SMOOT. One million five hundred thirty-four thousand one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

Mr. FLETCHER. It may be less this year than formerly, but we have received as much as $2,000,000 at that port, I think. As I have said, however, I do not think it important to go into these questions, because I do not see that they are involved in the matter before the Senate. The question now is, not whether we ought to have a collector here and a deputy collector yonder, but it is simply whether we will give the Treasury Department until January 1, 1914, to determine where deputy collectors ought to be placed, where customs officers ought to be placed, and where the districts ought to be placed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just the point I was trying to draw the Senator's attention to. There is no question that reorganization has been made; there is no question that the new system can be put in operation by the 1st day of July of this year. All that is involved in this matter is to continue the existing offices until January 1, 1914, and, in the meantime, to bring about changes in the reorganization made by President Taft by influences that may be brought to bear upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FLETCHER. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the two Senators who are engaged in this colloquy will give me some information I should like to have, it will, so far as I am concerned, throw much light upon the question. I assume that both Senators have investigated this matter very thoroughly. I imagine that the reorganization of this service authorized under the present law was intended to bring about certain economies in the service by cutting off collectors here and there where they were unnecessary. I have been informed—whether correctly or not I do not know—that the plan of reorganization which the department has worked out does not, as a matter of fact, materially reduce the expenses of the service. I want to ask the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Florida whether that is true, and if there is any saving as a result of this reorganization, what is the amount of saving?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is shown in the message of the President of the United States transmitting——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not read that, and I am asking for information.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say that it is all shown in the message from the President of the United States "transmitting plan of reorganization of the customs service and detailed estimate of the expenses of the same." In that message the detailed expenses are given, every item, and it shows that instead of the $10,500,000 that was appropriated for this particular service—and I might say that in the past that amount has always been insufficient—under the reorganization, with every item accounted for, the amount will be $10,381,726.01. So the Senator can see that there is a considerable saving in the reorganization plan.

Mr. FLETCHER. The President claims in the message, I may add, if the Senator will allow me, that it would reduce "the total cost of said service for said fiscal year by an amount not less than $350,000."

Mr. SIMMONS. The total cost being about $10,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Ten million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it would reduce that amount about $300,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. FLETCHER. That was the claim, but it was questioned by some other people.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a much larger reduction than I had been advised of. I thought it was less than that.

Mr. FLETCHER. On that point, if the Senator from Utah will allow me, in reference to the suggestion that the whole movement here is prompted by a desire to put more people in office or to keep some people in office, I desire to call attention to a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Commerce Committee referring this bill with his recommendation, wherein he says:

While this criticism—

That is, the criticism as to the reduction of the cost of the service—

may be unsound as a matter of law, still, in view of its existence and of the further fact that the reorganization as adopted by the President does not comprehend several administrative changes in the customs service which should be included in order to make a thorough and efficient organization, I have the honor to recommend that the bill be passed subject to the following amendments:

First. That the time of the taking effect of the reorganization be postponed to January 1, 1914—

That is, instead of two years, as the bill which I introduced provided.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have read carefully that report of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I do not think it is a very strong indorsement of this measure. I read from the first page the following:

The department has received a number of communications from various Senators and Representatives in Congress, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and individuals adverse to the proposed reorganization, but most of these protests have been based either on erroneous conceptions of the actual working of the plan or upon feelings of local pride. They do not alone, in my opinion, present valid or serious grounds for deferring the operations of the reorganization.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Utah, I think, are calculated to place this discussion on a plane where I do not think it belongs. Certainly in favoring any change——

Mr. SMOOT. I inquire to what remark made by me does the Senator refer?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I referred to the Senator's suggestion in regard to retaining places in which to put officers.

Mr. SMOOT. I referred to the present organization, which, of course, could be construed as the same thing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, I must say that it seems to me that so far as the State which I in part represent is concerned such a plane of argument as that or such a statement as that is not justified, for the reason that my State is particularly affected by this change. I will describe to the Senator in what way it is affected, as he has said that no particular State is affected.

Since 1799, under a statute of the United States, there has been located in the city of Wilmington a collector who could, immediately on the arrival of a vessel having a cargo destined to that port, settle all questions which might be in dispute regarding valuation, the duties to be paid, and the issuance of clearance papers, and he determined every question at once. Now, under the order of the President—and for myself I do not like Executive orders to take the place of statute law—the ports of Delaware are all placed in the district of Philadelphia. There are no district courts of Philadelphia; there are district courts of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, but there are many statutes of the United States which require that offenses shall be tried in the courts of the district where the offense is committed. If we are put in the district of Pennsylvania, for example, many criminal offenses may come up for trial, and we will not know where the forum of trial, where the situs of the offense, is. I suggest this as one of the objections to the Executive order.

I also suggest that the mere placing of the customs collector in the district of the Delaware River and Bay, under the domination of the port of Philadelphia, necessarily prefers that port. The President in his order describes it as the "headquarters" for the district. His designation of the port of a district is the "headquarters" of the district. "Headquarters," according to all the dictionary definitions that I can find, means the place from which orders are issued. It is usually, as applied to army matters, where the commander in chief is located. The mere naming of Philadelphia as "headquarters" gives Philadelphia a preference over every port in the district of Delaware River and Bay; and necessarily a master clearing a vessel from some foreign port, if he is going to the district of Philadelphia, clears for the port of Philadelphia. If a master sailing for the Delaware Bay has half a cargo for Wilmington and half a cargo for Philadelphia, he will necessarily take his boat directly to Philadelphia, where every question may be immediately determined and where he will not be delayed in unlading.

But the objection to this Executive order is far deeper than that. When the Constitution was adopted the question of the control of the ports of this country was a grave one.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, right in that connection I want to say to the Senator that past history has not proved what he says as to a foreign shipper clearing for a particular port because of its name. I want to call his attention to the district as it exists to-day called the Oregon and Washington district. Under the Washington and Oregon district there are five collectors, and they are located at different cities in both Washington and Oregon. They have never found any trouble whatever in the past in relation to the criticism the Senator has just offered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know how that may be in the Washington and Oregon district. I do not know the relative location of the ports. Here in this district, however——

Mr. SMOOT. They are not very much farther apart than the ports of Delaware and Philadelphia.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can not tell as to that.

Mr. SHIVELY. But none are subports; they are all ports.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, there are subports, both in Washington and in Oregon.

Mr. SHIVELY. But with these five collectors they are all ports.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; but in the reorganization it will be the same as far as results are concerned, and it will be called the Oregon district. In that district there will be one collector, just the same as there is one collector now, in the reorganization plan, at Philadelphia. When the Senator gets through I will explain how I understand the situation at Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator's explanation. I simply want to assure him that in this matter among Delawarians there is no question of partisanship; but there is a question to which I desire to call the Senator's attention and which probably will be raised in the courts of the United States, and, if I am correctly informed, which the Republican authorities in Delaware will see goes to the Supreme Court of the United States before it is determined.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want the Senator to distinctly understand that there is no partisan feeling with me in the position I have taken. I am only discussing the question as to whether or not the reorganized plan is the better as a whole. After the thorough examination that was made of it, and the report made to the President, and after it has been adopted and put into force, in my opinion the reorganization plan should not be changed. Perhaps the Senator may think otherwise. But I do feel it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the changes that are being made, and why I think they are being made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I suggest to the Senator, Mr. President, that if many of us, as we evidently do, disagree about the great benefit which may come from this reorganization, six months is not an excessive time in which to consider any changes which, as I understand, the Secretary of the Treasury desires in making this communication. It seems to me that granting a period of six months in which to consider any changes which are to be made in this order which, it must be admitted, was hastily drawn immediately prior to the 4th of March, when it had to be made in order to be valid, will undoubtedly benefit the order itself in regard to its details.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that I do not understand that this order has been hastily drawn. The matter has been considered, and investigations have been made of it, for some years past; and this plan is a culmination of that investigation. It is true that the President did not send in his message until March 3 of this year, and it is true that it does not take effect until the 1st of July of this year; but it is not true that it has been hastily worked out. I am positive that the investigation was a thorough one in every district and every port of this country.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can only suggest to the Senator from Utah that the President's order, as I understand, came in at 3 o'clock on the morning of the calendar day of March 4. Under the amendment of the sundry civil bill of 1912, he had had probably a year and a half to consider that matter. There must have been in his mind at that time grave doubts as to some of the provisions of his order to have caused him to retain it until that time, and not to have been able to get it in until the very last moment. It is human experience that when orders of that kind are made at practically the last moment that is possible, there have been some reasons for the delay; and the orders usually are not in the very best form that they could be made.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Right at this point I should like to make a statement. I do not think I am violating any confidence when I say that in discussing this very question with President Taft somewhere about the 1st of March he told me personally, as I was vitally interested in it, my State having two ports of entry affected by this order, that he had not had time to investigate it; that he knew it was important, and that the law seemed to require that he should investigate it. He asked me whether, in case he did allow it to go over, those who were asking for time for thorough investigation would undertake to defend his action in not fulfilling the requirements of the law by making that statement on the floor. He said that to me just a few days before he issued the order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I had no knowledge of that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to one or two other things. I do not know that he heard the suggestion I made the other day when the junior Senator from Florida introduced a bill affecting this same subject matter. It was that the constitutional provision which was inserted as clause 6 of section 9 of Article I of the Constitution provided that no preference should be given to the ports of any State over those of any other State, nor should vessels bound to or from one State be required to enter, clear, or pay duties in the ports of any other State.

I have been going over as carefully as possible all the decisions of the Supreme Court, and, so far as that is concerned, the decisions of the circuit and district courts, which bear on that point. I have not been able, of course, to find any case which is on all fours with the question now under discussion; but there are many of those cases, which I shall not weary the Senate by referring to, which seem to hold that this would be a preference of the ports of one State over those of the other—that is, a preference of the ports of Pennsylvania over the ports of Delaware, by placing over the subcollectors, if you see fit to call them so, or the deputy collectors, if you please, of all the ports of that great estuary, the collector in charge of the port of Philadelphia. My own belief is that that is the effect of it. I think that question will have to be examined in the courts of the United States if this Executive order stands. The people in my State, without exception, Democrats and Republicans, hope that we may maintain our State identity.

With respect to the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming, I only want to say that I have very grave doubts myself as to whether the wording of this amendment is sufficient to authorize the President of the United States to re-form the order made by the former President, which was an executed order. The question which he suggests, as I understand, is whether the power which has been given once has not been exhausted by its exercise. It seems to me that if we are going to pass this bill it would be well to be sure that it does give the President now in office an opportunity to re-form, in such respects as he may desire, the Executive order of the former President. I think, from reading this proposed act, that it would be very wise to do that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment right on that point?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Replying to the Senator from Delaware, my suggestion was this: I suppose that without the authority given to the President by the sundry civil bill of last year the President could not have made the adjustment that he did make. We gave him the authority so to do. We gave him no other or different authority. In the execution of the authority which we gave him he did, as a matter of fact, organize and complete the organization and proclaim it as the organization of the Customs Service. It is now a thing that is settled and done, and we can not undo it except by an act of Congress. We can not undo it except by enacting some legislation that shall do away with what is now the law of the land in the organization of the Customs Service. Whatever we authorized President Taft to do was done, and in pursuance of the authority which we gave, and which he exercised, the customs districts as he organized them and proclaimed them have become the customs districts of the United States.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Suppose, in place of having vested this power in the President of the United States, we had by statute made these changes, with the provision that they should take effect on the 1st of July. Could we not now, by act of Congress, suspend that operation until the 1st of January next?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Having vested the authority in the President, and that authority having been exercised by him, what is the difference between that and the conclusion which would have been reached if we had passed an act? It is exactly the same thing.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Why, no; that is not what we do. What we say in this bill—and I call the Senator's attention to the language—is "that the time for the performance by the President of the acts and things authorized to be done and performed by him" in a certain part of the sundry civil bill shall be extended. As a matter of fact, we can hardly extend the time for the performance of an act that has already been performed and completed. I have no objection to arriving at the conclusion that is desired by the committee; but my query was, Ought we not to proceed in the way that has just been indicated by the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I think so. I think we ought to suspend the effect of the law to which the Senator refers.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think that would be far preferable. I do not see how it is possible for us to extend the time for performing a thing that has already been performed and has been completed. We can suspend the operation of it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, granting that to be so, in view of the very serious suggestions made by the Senator from Delaware, in connection with what has been said by others, it does seem to me that there ought to be no difference of opinion that by an effective provision this matter should be so suspended that the proper conclusion may be reached.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not want the Senator from Georgia nor the Senator from Florida to consider for a moment that I have been speaking of the merits of the proposition.

Mr. BACON. I think myself that the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming is a very pertinent one. I think the bill ought to be reframed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIVELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Would merely extending the time be an adequate thing to do? If we leave this order just as it is now, and it requires modification, the question of modifying it will have to be faced on the 1st of next January just the same, will it not? So ought we not to reframe the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My impression is that by direct enactment of some sort we should give the President authority up to the first of next January to exercise exactly the same powers that President Taft has already exercised.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think there is something in that, and perhaps it should be done, but I wanted to have the viewpoint here one of sympathy on the side of giving effectiveness to what is asked here. There is no hostility to the purpose of the President's order in the report from the Secretary of the Treasury. He is in sympathy with it; he commends it; but he calls attention to some matters that require additional attention and may require some modification, and this bill is drawn for the purpose of affording additional time in which such errors may be corrected. Now, let us do it effectively.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope the Senator will not put me in the attitude of being hostile.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My only purpose is to have it effectual.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly; I understand that; but the Senator from Utah was making a rather wholesale attack on the purposes of this bill. The Committee on Commerce, made up of members of both parties, after considering this bill and the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury were in sympathy with it, and made a unanimous report here, because there seems to be good reason why a period of six months longer should be allowed for the purpose of making it fully effective.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have made no wholesale attack upon the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The intimation that the purpose of it is to hold in office so many customhouse officers, and all that kind of thing, I think is really unjust to the full committee that reported the bill. They took the report of the Secretary, and acted from an entirely different standpoint than that in their treatment of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have stated before that I am informed that the reorganization can be put into effect by July 1 of this year. If that is the case, there is some reason other than that for this proposed extension; and I asked the Senator from Florida as to what reasons there were.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Secretary of the Treasury cut down the term of the original bill at least a year in his proposed substitute for it.

Mr. SMOOT. A year and a half.

Mr. CRAWFORD. A year and a half. The Secretary of the Treasury being in touch with these complaints and questions, just such as the Senator from Delaware has raised here, recommended that this time be extended to the 1st of January. It seems to me that is a very reasonable request.

Mr. SMOOT. The very fact that the time was cut down from two years to six months led me to believe that there were some reasons other than those appearing upon the face of the matter, and I was simply trying to find out what those reasons were.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to answer the Senator from Delaware now, as I stated I would.

I understand the situation in Delaware to be this: Under the present plan there is a collector of the Delaware district located at Wilmington, Del., and there are two subports of entry.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Two or three.

Mr. SMOOT. Two in Delaware, one at Lewes and one at Seaford. Then there are ports of delivery in Delaware at New Castle and Port Penn and Delaware City. The only change that is made in the State of Delaware is that the collector will be located at Philadelphia instead of at Wilmington; but the deputy collector will be at Wilmington, and there will also be a subport of entry at Lewes. As far as the port of delivery is concerned, that will not be interfered with hereafter at any place in the United States wherever Congress designates a city as a port of delivery. It will be presided over by a surveyor of customs just as it is to-day under the present plan. So the only difference that there is in Delaware, as far as I can see, is that instead of having the collector located at Wilmington, Del., he will be located at Philadelphia, as Delaware is a part of the Philadelphia district.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Utah I can only say that if instead of calling the district of the Delaware River and Bay the district of Philadelphia they should call it the district of Wilmington and there locate the collector of customs for that district, and there settle all questions which might come up of a general character regarding the delivery of cargoes within that whole district, I think before long you would see the water front of Wilmington bristling with wharves and piers, and Wilmington might become a great rival for the commerce of Philadelphia. In that event the masters of vessels who had to unlade within the district of the Delaware River and Bay would naturally come to Wilmington, where questions of immediate importance to them could be promptly settled and they would not be delayed in the unlading or the delivery of their cargoes; and located 27 miles down the river, as it is, with the short rail transportation and the saving in water transportation up a tortuous channel, it would be almost as convenient for them to come there as it would be to go on. So if the change is made in this district and Wilmington is continued with a collector, and the collector is taken from the port of Philadelphia, Delawareans will probably be very well satisfied. In such an event as that, however, you would very soon hear the merchants and the shippers of Philadelphia complaining that a preference had been given to the ports of my State over the ports of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the objection made by the Senator from Delaware is answered by the Secretary of the Treasury to a great extent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, the Secretary of the Treasury calls a question of constitutional rights local pride. It is a misnomer of constitutional rights that they should be called local pride.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator insist that Wilmington, Del., has a constitutional right to be designated as the Delaware collection district?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I insist that the State of Delaware is entitled to the same privileges and the same consideration and the same rights to her ports as any other State has to its ports, and that to place over the ports of any State an official designated in another State and there having his headquarters, as shown by the President's order, is giving a preference to the ports of the State where the headquarters of the district are located.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator simply criticizes the whole system, not only the proposed plan of reorganization but the system as it exists to-day, because there are the Washington and Oregon and other districts in which more than one State is included. If there has been a wrong done to one or other of those States under the present system, of course we are doing nothing more under the proposed plan than what now exists.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But because one wrong has been done in one State surely it does not justify a second wrong being done in another State.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know that there has been a wrong done. Congress has passed upon every one of these districts, and has designated every district and subport of entry. Congress has had it all in its hands. The system in the past has been left to Congress, and this reorganization has been done by direction of Congress after a consideration of several years. In an appropriation bill authority was given to the President to make a reorganization, and money was provided for it. In accordance with that act the reorganization was made.

Of course I understand the Senator objects to the plan of reorganization, and he or any other Senator has that right. But I was not going to discuss that question. I thought the question here was simply as to an extension of time for six months, and I wanted to learn what that extension of time for six months was for, because I am informed that the plan can be put into operation by the 1st of July of this year.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can not answer——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can not answer as to what may be the object of other Senators in desiring this extension. The object which I have in favoring the extension is to enable the President to preserve in its integrity a district which has existed in my State for 125 years. I hope for that reason that the bill will be passed, and for that reason I shall vote for it. Other Senators have other reasons doubtless, but that is my reason as I have tried to explain.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have reason for asking to have the bill passed. The fact is that the consideration of this bill was very inadequate and somewhat hasty so far as the President of the United States was concerned. I happened to have some familiarity with it.

The port of Kansas City has been established for a good long while, and is a very important port. News was received at that city to the effect that the port was about to be abolished, or reduced to a subport, and protests were made to me. I saw the President about it at that time. He knew practically nothing about the matter beyond the fact that such a law had been passed in one of the appropriation bills, but in a practical way he was not advised. The whole matter had been turned over by him to one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, Mr. Curtis, who has charge of the customs service, and he was working out a plan of reorganization.

On the President's suggestion I visited Mr. Curtis and he laid the plan before me, so far at least as it related to the ports of my State. Beyond that I did not seek to go.

Later on when he had completed that work, almost at the end of President Taft's term, when the result of that work had become somewhat generally known, numerous Senators and, I think, Members of the House whose constituents were concerned, visited President Taft and talked with him about it. I do not venture to say that he was dissatisfied with the report made to him by Assistant Secretary Curtis, but it had taken weeks and weeks for Mr. Curtis to work out the plan. The President was pressed, closing up the business of his term, and he was sure that there was no relief from any mistakes made except by congressional action. A joint resolution it was suggested might be passed extending the time for the going into operation of this provision of law. I discussed it myself with numerous Senators on the floor, and I introduced an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill which I think was the last appropriation bill that came over.

My amendment was very similar in phraseology and identical in purpose with what appears in the bill now before the Senate, extending the going into operation of this provision in the sundry civil law under which this rearrangement has been made. The Senate adopted it in the last general deficiency bill, and it went to the House. That body did not see proper to adopt it. It went into conference, and was one of the very last items in that deficiency bill which the Senate yielded. I talked as other Senators here talked with the Senate conferees about it, and those conferees, headed by the colleague of my friend from Wyoming, were persistent in their demand that the amendment should remain.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield for just a moment? Was not the amendment to which the Senator refers incorporated in the deficiency bill prior to the time when the consolidation was reported back to Congress?

Mr. STONE. I am not sure about that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was in the last Congress, was it not?

Mr. STONE. Yes; it was in the closing days of the last session of the last Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And, in my judgment, it was a very proper provision at that time, the President up to that time not having acted and carried out the terms of the law.

Mr. STONE. I think the President delayed sending his report here until almost the last hours of his term.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Until the very last hours.

Mr. STONE. I think that is true; and I think I do not violate any propriety in saying that the President kindly, considerately, was waiting to see what action Congress would take with reference to the matter before sending in the report. He sent it because there was nothing else left for him to do under the mandate of the statute. So here it is.

Mr. President, there is no doubt whatever that numerous points designated as ports of entry ought to be stricken from the map as ports of entry. I read a public document showing that in many places the cost to the Treasury of collections exceeded by many fold the amount collected. There was one point I recall where it was stated officially that it cost $1,100 for every dollar collected. That was the most extreme of all the cases, and the figures ran on down in that way. Of course such things ought to be remedied. That for the saying. But, on the other hand, I think Mr. Curtis in formulating his plan of readjusting the customs service has made some mistakes. I do not say very many, but there are some. Kansas City, long a port of entry, is reduced to a subport.

Probably the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has the record in his hand; he has a document in his hand that looks very much like the one that I examined; but the record will show that the dues for duties collected at Kansas City on imports delivered there were collected at a rate almost as low as the cost incurred at St. Louis and Chicago. Nor is that all——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I will complete this one thought——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly; but I only wanted to understand what imports there are at the port of entry of Kansas City. Are they in bond, or how do the goods come to that port of entry? I confess my ignorance, and I wish to have light.

Mr. STONE. I presume it is just as they have a port of entry at any place.

Mr. CRAWFORD. By water transportation?

Mr. STONE. Or any subport. They have a collector and a surveyor of the port there, and unless this bill goes into operation——

Mr. CRAWFORD. But what do they receive to justify it?

Mr. STONE. Goods shipped from abroad can be shipped through to a port of entry at Salt Lake, Denver, or anywhere else.

Mr. President, I was going to say that Omaha and Denver in this reorganization scheme were retained as ports of entry, while Kansas City was reduced to a subport, and yet the collections at Kansas City far exceed those at both Omaha and Denver combined. It is no wonder that the merchants, manufacturers, importers, business men, and the people generally of that great, growing, thriving metropolis, the largest city between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean, the largest in population and in the volume of business, should protest. I think it ought not to have been done. I do not believe that President Taft ought to have done it; but it was in and you could not strike out one or another without reorganizing the whole thing; and he sent it in as it was prepared by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. I am not criticizing the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that the record may be correct, as I have it from the department, I want to say to the Senator that Kansas City and St. Louis at the present time are only ports of delivery and they are presided over by a surveyor of customs. Under the reorganization St. Louis is made a district, with a collector located there.

Mr. STONE. I know that.

Mr. SMOOT. And Kansas City remains just where she is to-day.

Mr. STONE. No; she does not. Kansas City is subordinated to St. Louis. Kansas City is put under the jurisdiction of St. Louis.

Mr. SMOOT. Not according to the report that I get from the department. It may be wrong, but——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, we talked this matter over with Mr. Curtis, the Assistant Secretary, at considerable length and looked into it, and I do not think I am mistaken; but whether so or not, I know that the office of surveyor of the port of Kansas City is abolished.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. STONE. I say it is, and Kansas City is subordinated to St. Louis, which is made the center of the district. It takes in Missouri and parts, if not the whole, of other States. Mr. Curtis disclosed to me what he had drawn off, a map showing the territory within the jurisdiction of the St. Louis district. I protested against it. All I wanted then and all I want now is that just such questions as these and such as my friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] refers to may be resubmitted to the judgment of the President of the United States.

There is no question of politics in it. There may be a question of an office or of two or three or a dozen, but what figure does that cut? In the course of human events it is possible that these offices will change, as they do change from one party to another. I have not that thought in my mind at all. I am simply discussing what I think is the absolute justice and right of this proposition.

Mr. President, I do hope that my friends from Utah and Wyoming will not put themselves very obstinately across the path of this measure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. STONE. I always yield to him.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope the Senator will not think I am throwing myself across the path of this measure. On the contrary, I am seeking to perfect the bill, so that it will be effective for the very purpose which the Senator desires. I am not opposing this extension of time, but I want to do it in such a way that it will resist all efforts to upset the extension of time; that is all.

If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I think the Senator from Florida has in his hand now a proposition which he proposes to submit as an amendment that will remove the objection which I had to the wording of the bill and fill all the purposes I desire to accomplish.

Mr. STONE. If it is a mere matter of phraseology, I will leave that to the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Florida to settle.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator had listened to me, I think he would have observed that it was a mere matter of phraseology upon my part in the interest of the measure.

Mr. STONE. I have said all I care to say.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield gladly in just a moment. I desire to say to the Senator from Missouri that I have no intention of obstructing the passage of this bill if the Senate feels that the present system is better than that proposed in the reorganization plan. It has developed here to-day that whenever the headquarters of a district have been removed from any State and a city in that State reduced to a subport of entry or even a port of entry, there has been objection upon the part of Senators representing that State. I thought that Missouri was well taken care of under the plan of reorganization as it has been reported to me from the department, because to-day St. Louis is nothing more than a port of delivery, and they have taken St. Louis from the status of a port of delivery, presided over by a surveyor of customs, and made her the headquarters of a district, with a collector in charge.

Mr. STONE. And the collector is the deputy of the present chief of that port.

Mr. SMOOT. The present chief of what port?

Mr. STONE. The port of Kansas City.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, so far as that is concerned, as soon as the reorganization plan goes into effect he will be the collector and not a surveyor of customs.

Mr. STONE. I beg pardon. As I understand, the deputy of the present surveyor or collector, or whatever he may be called, at Kansas City or some one else remains in charge as the deputy of the chief of the district at St. Louis.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say who will be appointed.

Mr. STONE. He is not appointed; he is under civil service; but I do not care about that. Here is the fact, if the Senator will pardon me: Under this arrangement the district of which St. Louis is the center, known as district No. 46, would consist of the States of Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and the south half of Illinois. That makes Kansas City a pretty small star in that firmament.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I am not going to discuss that question any further, except simply to state the matter again as I understand it, and that is that in the reorganization plan St. Louis is a new district, called the St. Louis district, the port of entry of which will be St. Louis and which will take in the territory that has been mentioned by the Senator from Missouri. It is true that it advances St. Louis and leaves Kansas City just as it is; but it certainly is an advantage to St. Louis.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to state that I will not take up the time of the Senate in discussing the pros and cons of this matter; nor do I concede that the impression of the Senator from Utah as to the grounds of objection to the order that was made on March 3 last are precisely as he has indicated. Those are matters of detail which, if the time is extended, we are to take up with the President and with the Secretary of the Treasury, to be thrashed out there, and I do not intend to go into that question at all. The proposition here is to suspend the operation of this order and then to extend the right and the power of the President until January 1, 1914.

Upon reflection I concede the point raised by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] upon the legal question. The President having already actually signed the order which he was authorized to sign by the act of August 24, 1912, there may be some doubt whether the bill in its present language would effect the purpose both of the Secretary and of the committee. Therefore I am going to offer these amendments:

After the word "the," where it occurs the first time, in line 7, page 2, insert "operation of the Executive order of March 3, 1913, made and promulgated." Strike out the words "time for the performance by the President of the acts and things authorized to be done and performed by him." Insert, in line 15, after the words "shall be," the words "suspended and the time for said reorganization." Then, at the end of that paragraph, in line 16, after the word "fourteen," insert "and that until the last-mentioned date the President is hereby authorized to modify, change, and amend the same"; so that, if amended, the first paragraph of the bill will read as follows:

That the operation of the Executive order of March 3, 1913, made and promulgated under the provisions of chapter 355 of the Statutes at Large, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, in so far as these relate to the reorganization of the customs service, shall be suspended and the time for said reorganization extended until January 1, 1914, and that until the last-mentioned date the President is hereby authorized to modify, change, and amend the same.

I offer that as an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since the bill has been amended I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida whether the act giving to the President authority to reorganize these districts limited the discretion of the President in any way in the reorganization. As to the number of districts or as to the expense connected with the service, is there a limitation in the law?

Mr. FLETCHER. The act, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, under which the President issued this order is the act of August 24, 1912, and the particular provision is found on page 20 of the sundry civil bill. That is not changed by the pending proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is not changed, but does that act fix——

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 10, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We rejoice, O God, our heavenly Father, in Thy goodness and in Thy wonderful works to the children of men. "The heavens declare Thy glory, and the firmament showeth Thy handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth and their words to the end of the world." And we rejoice with exceeding great joy that Thou didst reveal Thyself in the heart of the Christ as the Father of all men, and didst pour out Thy love for Thy children in the sublime sacrifice on the Cross of Calvary. We rejoice that the Christ spirit has been coming more abundantly and with greater potency into the hearts of men, uniting all peoples into one great family, teaching that what hurts one hurts all and what helps one helps all. Hasten the day, we beseech Thee, when all men shall recognize the sublime truth and practice it. In the spirit of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, June 6, 1913, was read and approved.

LEVEES ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, on May 15 last Mr. Albert S. Caldwell, of Memphis, Tenn., president of the Mississippi River Levee Association, delivered an address before the Arkansas Press Association, then in session in Memphis, on the subject of levees on the Mississippi River, which address is such an excellent presentation of this great and live subject that I ask unanimous consent to print the address in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

"The protection of the alluvial lands of the Mississippi River from overflow and the addition of this vast territory to the productive area of the United States is now generally admitted to be a national duty. The three great political bodies embodied declarations to this effect in their last platforms, and their candidates committed themselves to it during the campaign. On a recent visit to Washington I talked on this subject to 15 United States Senators from 12 different States, to many Members of Congress, to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Commerce, and the President. Every one of them said he was convinced that this work was national in scope and too great to be undertaken alone by the affected localities. I also visited New York, and there saw the managers or editors in chief of many prominent newspapers and magazines, and found the same opinion prevailing as in Washington. But always the same question was asked: 'How can the Delta be protected from floods?' This question has been answered many times and, to my thinking, in a conclusive and convincing way, but the 'pseudo scientists' of the newspapers, as the Scientific American, in its issue of May 3, calls them, and others who seek notoriety by suggesting methods at variance with the overwhelming weight of scientific opinion, have so befuddled the public mind that many who are sincerely anxious to help the cure of this national ill are in doubt as to the remedy. The prospect seems so big that they overlook what they would do if they had a problem to solve in their own business. If it involved engineering knowledge and skill, they would unhesitatingly consult engineers, and would accept their methods if shown that such methods had proven effective elsewhere. This is an age of specializing, and no intelligent man in the conduct of his own affairs allows himself to be confused by the opinions of persons who have had no experience in the work he desires done.

A WORK FOR ENGINEERS.

"The protection and reclamation of the Delta of the Mississippi River is a work for engineers, and if they are practically unanimous on methods their decisions ought to be accepted. Unfortunately, however, there is a widespread effort to belittle the opinions of engineers and to cast doubt on their conclusions without offering anything in their place. The Panama Canal, the locks at the Soo, the new river at Detroit, and innumerable other works of great magnitude in the United States were not constructed by advocates of vague and untried methods, but by engineers. Experts and not the 'pseudo scientists of the newspapers' constructed the world's greatest tunnels, its railroads, its submarine cables, its bridges, its irrigation systems, and other wonderful works, and yet the opinions of the men who did these great things and who have received the homage of the world count for little or naught with a certain newspaper which constructed the following remarkable sentence:

"The trouble with the levee expert is that if he were half as wise as he thinks he is he would be wise enough to know that he is not half as wise as he thinks he is.

"When it comes to a scheme of such magnitude and such far-reaching results as the protection of the Delta from overflow, a special obligation is imposed on those whose business is largely dependent on the prosperity of this region, to weigh carefully all proposed remedies and to refrain from confusing the public mind with a multiplicity of impractical projects, thus delaying, if not preventing, this beneficial work.

"Since many plans for the protection and reclamation of the Delta are now being advocated and the attention of the whole country is aroused through the public prints, I wish briefly to discuss some of them and to acquaint you with scientific opinion about the same.

RESERVOIRS.

"Reservoirs may be of value for small streams, but they are not feasible for as large a river as the Mississippi, even if the requisite land could be acquired, because their cost would be too great. As far back as 1860 a Government commission appointed by the United States, after years of investigation and study of the Mississippi River, reported:

"It has been demonstrated that no advantage can be derived either from diverting tributaries or constructing reservoirs.

"The Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, after two years' careful work and the taking of testimony, which fills a large volume, reported in 1898 as follows:

"The cost of constructing and maintaining a system of reservoirs would be enormous and far greater than the cost of leveeing the entire river basin. This scheme is regarded by engineers as wholly impracticable. Your committee can discover no just or adequate relief in reservoirs.

"Col. C. McD. Townsend, in his address in Memphis last September, referring to the flood of 1912, said:

"It would require over $73,000,000 to build reservoirs that would hold the water that passed down the river in one day. The cost of storing one day's flow is ample for all the levee construction required on the river, while, if reliance is placed on reservoirs, provision must also be made for the other 48 days during which the river was above a bank-full stage.

"And in his speech of April 11, 1913, before the National Drainage Congress in St. Louis, Mo., referring to the Pennsylvania and Ohio floods of 1913, he said:

"This proposed system of reservoirs would have cost hundreds of millions of dollars and its effect on this year's flood height of the lower Mississippi could not possibly have exceeded 6 inches.

"Current Opinion, in its May issue, referring to the flood of 1913, says:

"In the entire Ohio Valley above Louisville 9,000,000,000 gallons of water fell. It would have taken 87 reservoirs each 20 miles long, 1 mile wide, and 25 feet deep to hold it.

"Make these into one, and you would have a reservoir 1,740 miles long and 1 mile wide and 25 feet deep, longer, wider, and deeper than the Mississippi River from Memphis to the Gulf. Without counting the cost of such reservoir, consider the small effect it would have had at Memphis. Col. Townsend, in his St. Louis speech, said:

"The water which passed Cairo on the 2d of April, 1913, came principally from the White and Wabash and the lower tributaries of the Ohio River, and after the waters of these rivers started to subside the flood from Cincinnati increased the flood heights at Cairo less than 1 foot.

"Even if the money and land could have been found for this enormous reservoir, how many more reservoirs would have been required to take care of waters from the White and Wabash, the Cumberland and the Tennessee in 1913, and what would they have cost? When floods come down the upper Mississippi or from the Missouri, how many and how large reservoirs would be required to hold their waters, where would they be placed—without speaking of the cost?

"Referring to the flood of 1912, which did not come from the Ohio Valley, Col. Townsend said in his St. Louis speech:

"To have retained the Mississippi flood of 1912 within its banks would have required a reservoir in the vicinity of Cairo, Ill., having an area of 7,000 square miles, slightly less than the State of New Jersey, and a depth of about 15 feet; the quantity of material to be excavated in its construction would be over 100,000,000,000 cubic yards, and its estimated cost from fifty to one hundred billions of dollars. Such a volume of earth would build a levee line 7,000 miles long and over 150 feet high.

"An interesting article in the Scientific American of May 3, 1913, written by Charles Whiting Baker, editor in chief of the Engineering News, after discussing the reservoir system at length, says:

"When we apply the cost of reservoir construction per million gallons of water stored to the huge volumes of water required to be stored, if we are to take care of the flood waters of rivers draining thousands of square miles, the magnitude of the sum required becomes appalling.

REFORESTATION.

"Expert investigation has proven that forests have very little to do with floods. The Senate Commerce Committee, to whose investigation I have referred, went into this matter fully, and reported as follows:

"Nothing in the evidence discloses the fact that the destruction of timber tends to cause or promote floods. It is the generally accepted opinion that it tends to rather diminish than to increase the rainfall.

"Col. Townsend, in his St. Louis speech, says:

"It is therefore apparent that even under the most extravagant claims of forestry advocates reforestation as a means of reducing flood heights on the Mississippi River requires the conversion of too much farming land into wilderness to be practicable. The waste land that can profitably be converted into forest reservations is too limited in area to produce an appreciable effect on floods. It requires from 20 to 50 years to produce a good forest growth, and over a century for the leaves of that forest to decay in sufficient quantities to produce the humus which will be satisfactory as an absorbent of rainfall. We can not afford to delay the drainage of the Mississippi Valley that long.

"The article in the Scientific American referred to gives some interesting facts on this question:

"There are many records of great torrents flowing over regions which were covered with dense forests. The flood in the Hudson River on March 27 and 29, 1913, was enormous and caused great damage at Troy and Albany, yet the height which the flood attained and the volume flowing in the river were less than the flood which occurred in February, 1857, and which was caused by water from the southern part of the Adirondack region. In 1857 nearly the whole of this region was covered with primeval forest. Better proof that a forest covering upon a watershed can not prevent great floods in the streams flowing from it can scarcely be given. Old records show also that in 1832 there was a flood in the Ohio River at Pittsburgh which was 5 feet higher than the flood of April, 1913. In 1832, however, a very large part of the watersheds of the Allegheny and Monongahela was covered with dense forests. The greatest flood height on record in the Mississippi River, at St. Louis, occurred in 1844 and the next highest in 1775. At both these dates the entire territory drained by the upper Mississippi and Missouri Rivers was in its natural condition. The recent floods—referring to those of 1913—were caused by an extraordinarily heavy rainfall, and nothing that man has done in the removal of the forest, cultivation of the ground, or the drainage of swamps had anything to do with it.

TRIBUTARIES AND OUTLETS.

"Other suggestions for reducing flood heights are the turning of some of the waters into tributaries, making cut-offs, and outlets. The United States commission in 1860 came to this conclusion:

"It has been demonstrated that no advantage can be derived from diverting tributaries and that the plans of cut-offs and of new or enlarged outlets to the Gulf are too costly and too dangerous to be attempted.

"The Senate Commerce Committee in 1898 says:

"Your committee can discover neither from the evidence nor from other sources any material relief from the outlet system.

"Col. Townsend, in his speech in Memphis on September 26, 1912, says:

"Cut-offs have been repeatedly tried in Europe as a means of reducing floods, but always with disastrous results. A cut-off affords relief at one locality, but at the expense of another.

"I thought the outlet plan had died with John Cowden, but only a day or two ago it bobbed up in a newspaper, and the old scheme of sending the Mississippi River to the Gulf through the Atchafalaya was again exploited. Owing to pressure brought to bear on the Government a number of years ago a thorough investigation of this scheme was made, and its futility as well as its appalling dangers were clearly proven.

"Since Cowden's scheme apparently has outlived him, I shall not be surprised to have the 'pseudoscientists of the newspapers' advocate canals on the east and west banks of the river as large as the river itself, insist on digging holes in the bottom of the river to connect with subterranean currents, and even the erection at regular intervals along the banks of hot-air outfits to increase evaporation.

ABOLITION OF THE LEVEE SYSTEM.

"While the total abolition of the levee system can hardly be considered a remedy for floods, yet some owners of lands wholly outside the levees and others who own no land anywhere cry for this. Even a certain newspaper, without the courage to openly advocate it but which almost daily declares levees to be a failure, every now and then hints at it and tries to persuade planters whose lands have been overflowed that the benefit to their soil from silt deposit more than offsets flood damage. It is needless to say that the sole proprietor of this paper does not own a plantation. It is asserted that with the levees removed the water would spread over a vast territory, would not be deep, and would run off quicker; but it is well known that the immense volume of water passing through levee crevasses takes much longer to reach outlets than when confined within the river's bank. The shallowness of an overflow as late as that of 1912, or in June, as sometimes has happened, and which would frequently happen without levees, is not of much consequence to the planter who sees the catfish sporting in the furrow and hears the bullfrog croaking in the meadow. To destroy present levees would be utterly impossible, and any attempt would be met not by injunction, the weapon of the law, but by the shotgun, a more immediate and effective weapon for the protection of property.

RISE OF RIVER BED.

"Before I come to levees as a means for flood protection I want to say a few words about the false statement which has often been made and is now frequently being made that levees cause the bed of the river to rise, and that after a while the bottom of the river will be where the top of the levees now is, and that, consequently, no limit can be placed on levee heights. To prove this it has been asserted that levees have caused the beds of certain European rivers to rise. Though this is not true, it is said and written over and over again. As far back as 1860 the Government commission, referring to the River Po, said:

"The extreme low water surface of the River Po has not changed perceptibly in more than two centuries, and consequently the bottom of the river has not been elevated during that time.

"Col. Townsend, in his address in Memphis last September, said:

"Several hundred years ago a French traveler visited Italy, and on his return reported that levees had raised the bed of the Po River. This statement was carefully investigated and found to be untrue, but it has traveled over the whole world wherever rivers have been improved and vexed the engineers in charge of their improvement. The French engineers have made careful investigation of the leveed rivers of France and found no evidence of such action. The Germans have studied the Rhine and the Austrians the rivers of Austria-Hungary and fail to detect it. The Mississippi River Commission has made similar observations of the Mississippi River and found more evidence of a scour than a fill.

"As great a newspaper as the New York Evening Post last February stated that levees had caused the bottom of the Mississippi River to rise, and what do you suppose was their authority? Mark Twain, when he was a pilot on the river. This paper did not take the trouble to find out whether the Government had taken soundings or if it had any reliable data on the subject, but relied entirely on Mark Twain's statement made years and years ago. Is it not astonishing?

LEVEES.

"A properly constructed levee system is the only feasible and economical method of preventing floods of the lower Mississippi River. This has been the opinion of all civilian engineers who have given the problem special study and of all United States engineers who have had charge of Government works along the river. As United States engineers are not allowed to stay in any locality more than two or three years and as there are many sections of the river each in charge of an officer, there have been many such in the last 25 years whose duty it was to investigate this system, and they have done so entirely free from personal interest or scientific prejudice. For a like period of time the Mississippi River Commission—a body composed of civilian engineers as well as those of the United States Army and a body varying greatly in its personnel over this period—has studied the subject and approved levees as the proper means for flood control.

"As far back as 1860 the Government commission, after discarding other methods, as I have already shown, came to this definite conclusion:

"The plan of levees which has always recommended itself by its simplicity and its direct repayment of investments, can be relied upon for protecting all of the alluvial bottom lands liable to inundation below Cape Girardeau.

"Another United States commission in 1875 so decided.

"The Senate Committee on Commerce in 1898 boldly declared:

"From all the evidence taken by your committee it is evident that the basins along the Mississippi River can only be protected from floods by an ample and complete system of levees from Cairo to the Head of the Passes.

"Col. Townsend, one of the ablest engineers in the world and now president of the Mississippi River Commission, was stationed in Memphis for over six years, in charge of this section of the Mississippi River. He also has spent many years on other portions of the river. He has investigated the levee systems of foreign countries, and it can almost be said he has made levees a life study. In his Memphis speech he said:

"Levees have been tested for ages and have proved uniformly successful when built to adequate dimensions; no other method of relief from floods has been successfully applied to large streams.

"Maj. E. M. Markham, of the United States Corps of Engineers, in an article which appeared in the Memphis Commercial-Appeal on May 4, says:

"It is therefore somewhat difficult to follow the theory, if one exists, upon which is based any conclusion that levees once built to the height and section demanded by well-understood principles of physics, will not keep the basins dry from any river stage for which they may be constructed, since it is not understood why the head, current, and soil elements of the question along the Mississippi are assumed to be so vastly different from those of many other well-known rivers whose waters for many years, and in some cases for centuries, have been successfully restrained by earth levees or 'mud banks,' if you please, where such levees have been designed and actually constructed in suitable relation to preconceived maximum river stages.

"Are the opinions of all these educated and scientific men who have had ample opportunities for investigation to be cast aside as worthless? Are the opinions of all foreign engineers who have had experience in such matters to be wholly ignored?

"The European engineers who build the levees along the Rhine, the Danube, the Po, and the Arno—all alluvial streams like the Mississippi—and which have held for hundreds of years, would be amused, if not astonished, by the slurring comments of some of our 'pseudo scientists of the newspapers' who call levees 'mud banks,' and who have a thrill of joy whenever a break occurs in a levee half the size of a properly constructed embankment. But we need not go to Europe for a tangible and visible proof of the efficacy of a fairly well constructed levee system. The levees in Maj. Dabney's district, 100 miles long, have not broken. Even these levees are not up to the standard of the perfect system proposed by the Mississippi River Commission, but they held the unprecedented waters of 1912 and 1913. Why not point to the Dabney levees as proof of the efficacy of levees when built properly instead of rejoicing over a crevasse in badly constructed levees, declaring this to be proof of levee failure? I fear the levee croakers are like the woman convinced against her will—she is of the same opinion still.

THE NEWLANDS BILL.

"Senator NEWLANDS, of Nevada, is the author of an elaborate bill providing for the expenditure of a huge sum of money for various projects, among others the Mississippi River levees. It provides an annual appropriation of $50,000,000 for 10 years, $35,000,000 of which is apportioned as follows: Ten million dollars to the Mississippi River from St. Louis to the Gulf, $5,000,000 to the Missouri River, $5,000,000 to the Ohio River, $5,000,000 to the Mississippi River above St. Louis, $5,000,000 to the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers in California, $5,000,000 for the purchase of additional forest lands. There are no specific apportionments to the following departments mentioned in the bill:

"The Smithsonian Institute for obtaining information relating to the subjects covered by the bill.

"The Bureau of Plant Industry for establishing garden schools and farms, instruction in irrigation and fertilizers, and for the purchase of lands for such purposes.

"The Geological Survey for topographical surveys and for examination of lands to be purchased.

"The Reclamation Service for building irrigation systems and the purchase of lands for that purpose.

"The Forest Service for the protection from fire and insect infestation of national forests, building of roads, establishment of nurseries, reforestation of denuded areas, and various other matters connected with forestry.

"The expenditure of the $10,000,000 provided for the Mississippi River from St. Louis to the Gulf covers bank revetment, levees, waste ways, by-passes, flood-water canals, restraining dams, impounding basins, reservoirs, artificial lakes, and regulation of the flow of source streams. The meaning of some of these words I do not understand, but the important fact remains that levees are provided for. Much of the bill seems to be vague and uncertain, but everything it contemplates to be done may be worthy of the doing. But I believe the control of the Mississippi River and the reclamation of the empire along its banks is big enough to be treated by itself and not made dependent upon projects in other sections of the country which are not of such magnitude and importance to the Nation at large.

"The bill which the Mississippi River Levee Association has been instrumental in introducing in Congress provides for a national appropriation of $60,000,000, to be expended over five years—$6,000,000 per annum for levee and $3,000,000 per annum for bank revetment; and on the express condition that the States, through their levee boards, contribute $3,000,000 per annum for five years for levees. This would make available $12,000,000 per annum for levees and $3,000,000 per annum for bank revetment; and the Mississippi River Commission, which has made a careful estimate of the cost of this work, declares this to be sufficient to put the levees in an impregnable position and forever prevent overflow. While we are asking the Government to help us, we are not trying to prevent it from helping others. Our position has either not been understood by many of the advocates of the Newlands bill or else has been purposely misrepresented. Because we believe that the Mississippi River should be treated by itself, just as the Panama Canal was, and because we think we can obtain from Congress an appropriation of $60,000,000 for a definite undertaking of Nation-wide interest easier than an appropriation of $500,000,000 for many and varied projects, we have been accused by some of the advocates of the Newlands bill as dippers into the 'pork barrel.' I have always understood the 'pork barrel' belonged to those Members of Congress who swapped votes for the purpose of getting appropriations for their respective districts. There is nothing of this sort in our bill, because it deals with one matter only, and which is now universally recognized as of the greatest importance to every section of the country. There is no inducement to swap votes for this bill. The Newlands bill, to the contrary, provides for many things in many parts of the country and seeks the appropriation of an enormous sum of money. If we are casting longing eyes toward the 'pork barrel,' are the Newlandites looking in another direction? Senator NEWLANDS complains of certain southern Senators and Representatives in his article in the Saturday Evening Post of May 10. I quote his words:

"I regret to say that the Members of Congress and Senators from the lower Mississippi Valley have been most persistent in their opposition to the measure.

"This may be so, but these are men of high character, who would allow their own country to be devastated by floods every year rather than advocate the expenditure of the Government's money upon untried or impracticable schemes. I am sure all meritorious projects in the Newlands bill will receive their support. In a speech before the Interstate Levee Association at Memphis last September Mr. George H. Maxwell, one of the ablest advocates of the Newlands bill, said:

"There is not anybody in the world who does not recognize the fact that you have got to have a system of embankments lining this river from Cape Girardeau to the Gulf, and it has got to be a good deal bigger and a good deal better built than you have now. Those who are in favor of reservoirs do not say to discontinue your levee system. They do not say make your levees any lower or any higher. They say make them just as strong as can be made.

"Isn't this one of the important things in the Newlands bill? Why, then, should Senator NEWLANDS and his followers be so antagonistic to the very thing they say ought to be done? As the levees can be quickly constructed, and as some of the other things in his bill will take a very much longer time and are not supported by scientific authority as strongly as the levees, why should not Senator NEWLANDS help us to get the levees at once and then take up his other projects? If these are worthy, they can as easily be passed with the Mississippi River eliminated from the bill as with it in, and if they are not worthy there is small chance of their being carried into effect, even with our cause tied to them.

CONCLUSION.

"I conclude with a quotation from the Scientific American:

"That a few weak places in the levees failed in last year's flood and in this year's is no fault of the levee system, but is due to the fact that the levees have been built not to the height and width and strength that engineers knew to be advisable, but to such dimensions as the landowners along the river were willing to tax themselves for. It is doubtless too much to expect that the general public, deceived as it is apt to be by the pseudoscientists of the newspapers, will form correct opinions of such matters as river regulation and flood control for a long time to come. It may be hoped, however, that the public will learn to rely in such matters on the opinion of expert engineers."

RESOURCES OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article from the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, on the resources of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article on the resources of Oklahoma. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the wonderful resources of Oklahoma and the opportunities the State offers for the investment of capital, and the rewards offered for industry and energy in agriculture, manufacturing, mercantile business, and in almost every line of human endeavor. But with all that has been published complimentary to the new State it may be truthfully said "the half has never been told." If I should attempt to eulogize our people, describe our resources, and paint a true picture of our progress in the past and of our possibilities in the future, what I say would be the testimony of an interested witness. I therefore want to present the statement of a witness who is not only disinterested but who is thoroughly competent to testify on the subject about which he writes. By the consent of the House, I print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article appearing in the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, in the issue of May 29, 1913, written by the editor, Mr. Richard H. Edmonds. The article is as follows:

The amazing development of Oklahoma in agriculture, in oil and gas production, and in railroad and city building activities during the last 10 years, which has been one of the most remarkable features of American progress, is to be surpassed in the coming 10 years. All that has been done has been pioneering work. In agriculture many problems had to be solved; in oil development many hundreds of thousands of dollars had to be lost in testing out the oil fields in the State. In railroad work operations have been seriously hampered by unwise political agitation, some of it honest, some of it thoroughly dishonest work of the political agitator, working for his own interest while making the people believe he was working for theirs. In city building activities some mistakes have been made by overdoing speculative land operations, but the number of these seems to be exceedingly small when all things are taken into consideration. Indeed one of the most striking facts which impresses the student of the development of this State is the relatively small amount of speculative operations, especially in connection with the vast oil and gas operations, that is going on as compared with speculation in times past in other oil and gas regions. There is here none of the wild speculative boom of the Beaumont section when that city suddenly became the center of the world's oil activities, nor is there anything comparable to the speculative era in the Indiana gas fields when that section was undergoing its wonderful development following the discoveries of gas in large quantities.

Men from all over the world are gathering in Oklahoma, and capital from abroad, from the North and from the West, is being heavily invested in oil and gas and manufacturing operations. But this great movement of men and money has not produced anything like as much speculation as I have found in times past in other rapidly developing regions. Indeed, so far as speculative land forever is concerned, I believe there is less of it in evidence, even in the most rapidly developing centers of oil and gas activity, than in many of the conservative but growing cities of the central South.

Oklahoma has been an experiment station for testing out many political theories. A good many of them have proved dismal failures. Its progress, amazing as it has been, would have been far greater had it never suffered from this fever of political agitation and the energy with which it was worked by the politicians as an experiment station in politics, in finance, and in railroad control. A saner view of the situation is coming about. The people of the State have learned by costly experience that a good many of the experiments that have been tried by politicians have been paid for by the people and not by the politicians. There is now a widespread sentiment throughout the State to bring about more favorable conditions for the building and operation of railroads. It is fortunate that this is the case, because all the indications point to a volume of traffic which will tax to their utmost capacity all the railroad facilities of this section. It is absolutely essential to the best interests of the State, agricultural, industrial, and commercial, that railroads shall be given as quickly as possible every opportunity to find new capital in order to increase their facilities over existing lines and to build much-needed branch lines. If it were not fairly well assured that more favorable legislation will put the railroads in shape to do this, then the situation in all this region would be considerably endangered by the certainty of transportation facilities being wholly inadequate to meet the growing needs of the State.

The pioneering work has been done, and the field has been cleared and made ready for much greater progress than that of the past. Every condition in every line of business except that of the purely town-lot speculation is preparing for a far-reaching advance.

One of the greatest changes that is now taking place in the industrial life of the Southwest is the practical transference to the Oklahoma field from Indiana and Kansas of the window-glass and bottle-making industry. This change is significant of what will follow in the near future in other lines of industry. The gas potentialities of Oklahoma are apparently almost without limit, and as far as is possible the people who dominate the gas situation are conserving this priceless fuel supply for utilization in home industry. It is estimated by competent authorities that when the glass-making plants now under construction are completed this section will make more than 80 per cent of the window and bottle glass produced west of the Mississippi River.

For a year or more the Frisco railroad people have been quietly but aggressively working to bring about this transference of the industry from the practically exhausted gas regions of some other States to this virgin gas field. The strength of the situation here is greatly increased by the large supplies of available coal which can be utilized in the years to come should the gas supply become partly exhausted, as elsewhere. So abundant, however, is the supply of gas, with wells in many places having a producing capacity of 5,000,000 to 25,000,000 feet per day, and rigid laws preventing the undue waste of gas, that it seems reasonable to look for a much longer life for this gas field than is usually anticipated in any gas region.

Indicative of the glass-making industry and the rapidity of its development, a large proportion of which is due to the work of the Frisco System's department of development, is the following list of glass plants now in operation or under construction:

Tulsa, Tulsa Glass Co., jelly glasses.
Sand Springs, A. H. Kerr & Co., fruit jars.
Sand Springs, Kelly Glass Co., lamp chimneys.
Sapulpa, Sapulpa Glass Co., window glass.
Sapulpa, Sunflower Glass Co., window glass.
Sapulpa, Premium Glass Co., lamps and jelly glasses.
Sapulpa, Schram Glass Manufacturing Co., fruit jars.
Okmulgee, Coffeyville Window Glass Co., window glass.
Okmulgee, Skelton Glass Co., window glass.
Okmulgee, Baker Bros. Glass Co., window glass.
Okmulgee, Graham Bros. Glass Co., bottles.
Blackwell, Oklahoma Glass Co., fruit jars.
Ponca City Glass Co., window glass.

The cash investment in these plants will be considerably over $1,000,000, and possibly will run to $1,500,000. The largest single plant is that of the Skelton Glass Co., which is under construction, and already has under roof about 8 acres. Dr. Skelton, the owner of this plant, a very large operator in oil and gas, as well as in industrial interests, states that when the plant is fully completed and ready for operation it will represent an actual outlay of at least $1,000,000. Based on this estimate of cost for this plant when completed, a total for all of these plants will considerably exceed the amount stated. The Skelton plant is being built for producing glass by patented machinery. A number of other glass plants are now negotiating with a view to locating in this section.

While the glass-making industry in this rapid development is of great importance not only in itself, but by reason of the fact that it is indicative of a trend of industrial interest to these almost limitless gas fields, the tremendous oil industry of the State is the spectacular thing of the day and likewise the great wealth and freight creator.

Up to the present time a large proportion of the oil produced in this State has been shipped out by pipe lines in its crude state to be refined elsewhere. Now there is a very rapid growth of the oil-refinery industry in Oklahoma, which will add vastly to the railroad traffic and at the same time practically quadruple the value of every barrel of oil that passes from its crude form, through the refineries now in operation and now being erected, to the refined state. In some cases the value of the oil and the by-products will far more than quadruple the crude-oil value, but it is safe to say that every barrel of oil, on the average, which is now selling for 88 cents a barrel will, as it passes through local refineries, be increased in value to at least $4 as a minimum.

Last year this State produced in the neighborhood of 130,000 barrels per day, and a little more than a year ago the price was 50 cents per barrel. At the present time careful estimates make the production 165,000 barrels per day, while the market price is 88 cents a barrel. This will mean an increase of probably 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 barrels for the year, carrying the production of this year to largely over 60,000,000 barrels, as against 52,000,000 barrels last year. With this increase in production and an increase of nearly 100 per cent in price, this year's oil output will probably be at least double the value of last year's.

At the present time there are in operation two pipe lines carrying oil to Port Arthur and one to Baton Rouge, where the Standard Oil Co. has a large refinery. There are three pipe lines to the north owned by the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., formerly a subsidiary of the Standard and probably still controlled by the Standard Oil people. This Prairie company carries oil to Whiting, Ind., and it is there continued on its journey in the pipe lines of the Standard Oil Co. to Bayonne, N. J., a distance of probably 1,800 to 2,000 miles. There are four small pipe lines that carry oil to independent refineries in the north and to Kansas. The Magnolia company proposes to build another line from this field to a connection with its Texas line, in order to pipe oil to Beaumont for refining at that point.

The refineries now in operation or under construction include the following:

Chelsea, Chelsea Refining Co., 800 barrels daily capacity.
Vinita, Milican Refining Co., 1,000 barrels daily capacity.
Sand Springs, Phoenix Refining Co., 4,000 barrels daily capacity.
Sand Springs, Waters-Pierce Oil Co., 1,000 barrels daily capacity.
Tulsa, Constantine Refining Co., 1,000 barrels daily capacity.
Tulsa, Texas Oil Co., 5,000 barrels daily capacity.
Tulsa, Uncle Sam Oil Co., 6,000 barrels daily capacity.
Tulsa, Cordon Refining Co., 3,000 barrels daily capacity.
Sapulpa, Sapulpa Refining Co., 4,000 barrels daily capacity.
Okmulgee, American Refining Co., 3,000 barrels daily.
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma City Refining Co., 600 barrels daily capacity.
Big Heart, Southwest Refining Co., 750 barrels daily capacity.
Ponca City, Ponca City Refining Co., 5,000 barrels daily capacity.
Cushing, C. B. Shaffer, 3,000 barrels daily capacity.
Cushing, Brown Refining Co., 500 barrels daily capacity.
Cleveland, Cleveland Petroleum Co., 500 barrels daily capacity.
Muskogee, Muskogee Refining Co., 1,000 barrels daily capacity.
Muskogee, Cudahy Refining Co., 500 barrels daily capacity.
Coalton, Coalton Refining Co., 200 barrels daily capacity.

The Magnolia Oil Co. has secured an option on land at Oklahoma City with a view to build a refinery, and it is understood that it will be of large size.

It is estimated the last year local refineries took about 16 per cent of the oil production of the State, and that this year, with the large number of new big refineries under construction and included in this list, home refineries will take at the rate of 80 per cent or more of the enlarged production of this field.

Pittsburgh bankers and business men who recently came down to this section in a special train made the statement that since the beginning of the oil and gas development Pittsburgh had sold to these interests in Oklahoma $90,000,000 worth of machinery. When one sees a forest of well-drilling rigs and notes the almost numberless storage tanks and the vast supplies of piping and other equipment, he can readily believe that the Pittsburgh estimate of $90,000,000 is very conservative.

There are now about 23,000 to 24,000 producing wells in the State, and over 1,000 are now being drilled. About five carloads of material is required for every well put down. The general view of the most conservative men to be found in the State and the men longest identified with the industry is that this oil development will spread over a still wider portion of the State and give a very much larger production even than the magnificent totals of to-day. Prof. Gould, for many years the State geologist of Oklahoma, says:

"It is altogether probable that 50 years will elapse before all the oil territory will be discovered and possibly 50 years longer before the oil has all been taken from the ground. In addition to the vast deposits of oil and gas, Oklahoma contains, according to the estimates of the United States Geological Survey, 79,000,000,000 tons of coal. If ever Oklahoma's oil and gas are exhausted, the supply of coal will be ample for many generations. Those in position to know are of the opinion that Oklahoma has available nearly 2,000,000,000,000 cubic feet of gas per day. At the important gas centers glass-making industries and other manufacturing concerns are contracting for gas on the basis of 3 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, with slightly higher figures for small consumers. So great is the enthusiasm of Oklahoma for the establishment of industries that many towns are not only willing to make contracts for gas at 3 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, but add to this free sites and large cash bonuses to industries that will stand close investigation."

Added to this phenomenal activity in oil and gas and glass making, and the great advance in refining in the State, Oklahoma is this year blessed with a promise of the largest crops it has ever produced. Moreover, the introduction all over the State of silos which have been put in by thousands, and some say by tens of thousands, has saved the farming interests from the danger of droughts, for if a drought comes in the future it will be possible for a very large proportion of the farmers in the State to cut the growing crop and put it into silos for cattle feeding. This development is on so large a scale and is being so actively encouraged by the farmers who have tested it, and by bankers and railroads who are encouraging its introduction, that from an agricultural standpoint the future of Oklahoma is a much safer, sounder proposition than ever before.

A Commonwealth of almost limitless potentialities is here rounding into form.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary and, as I think, the unreasonable and extravagant delay in passing the sundry civil appropriation bill. It is now six weeks since that bill passed this House, and when it passed the majority of the House said that haste was so important and delay so dangerous that they looked back into the precedents and brought forth the most drastic rule they could find and limited debate on that great bill to only 40 minutes, because time was so precious.

It passed the Senate more than a month ago, and although minutes were so precious then that they could allow only 40 minutes' debate, yet those minutes have grown into hours and days and weeks and the bill still sleeps in the hands of the Senate committee. An editorial in a Washington paper a day or two ago complained that many citizens of Washington were embarrassed by the failure of that bill to pass. Very likely that will not impress very much the membership of this House, but it is a fact that not only citizens of Washington but the departments of this Government are very seriously embarrassed by the failure of these appropriations. The public-buildings appropriations are annually made in this bill. They are only provided for up to the 4th of March, and after that time they can not meet their contracts because of the failure of this bill. The river and harbor appropriations are in the same condition. I have been told that one important bureau of the administration is crippled and can not put its men to work because of the lack of these appropriations, and they say that the units of work will be doubled in cost because of this delay. Now, why is this delay? The ostensible reason is because the Senate refuses to agree to the House clause which cuts down the membership of the Board of Managers for the Soldiers' Home from 11 to 5. I personally believe that that is the real cause of the delay. It is whispered in private conversations, it is intimated in the press that there is another mysterious and secret reason; that it is because the President does not like to have the clause in this bill come before him which forbids certain funds to be used for the enforcement of the Sherman Act. Now, I confess I do not believe in that mysterious suggestion. I do not know anything about the opinion of the President on that subject. I do not know whether he has the courage of his convictions like his predecessor, but I can not conceive why procrastination is going to help him. I can not see why he needs six weeks to make up his mind, and therefore I do not believe that he instigated the holding up of this great bill in order for him to decide, and so I believe that the real reason is because the Senate is unwilling to cut down the board of managers from 11 to 5.

It is a small, petty, ridiculous question on which to hold up such a great bill, but it deals with patronage, with offices, and it has not been unheard of in the past for such questions greatly to interest the Senate. I have entire sympathy with the attitude of the House upon this question. I believe that it is in the interest of wise and economical administration that the board should be cut down from 11 to 5. The House has an additional reason, because the Senate already once receded. In the compromise last session over the last bill in which this clause existed the Senate objected to it, but under the "give and take" which comes in conference the Senate, in consideration of what the House yielded, yielded upon this question. But now the Senate is trying to hold to what they got without giving up any consideration for it. To be sure it was a Republican Senate then, but in fairness I ought to state that it yielded reluctantly, and I have never discovered any very serious difference between Republican and Democratic Senators on questions of patronage. So I think the Senate ought to yield and that this great administrative measure ought not to be held up because of this preposterous small issue.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to have two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may have two minutes more. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have understood that some members of this board of managers who are going to lose their positions have been active in trying to keep them. In fact, if I was disposed to state what I only know on hearsay, if I was disposed to state as a fact what I was unwilling or unable to prove by testimony, I might say that an insidious lobby was at work on the side of the Senate proposition. But I do not care to say that. Only it does seem to me——

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I can not yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. GILLETT. But it does seem to me that the President of the United States, who has not shown any great reluctance to impress his opinions upon either branch of Congress, who has been widely advertised as coming up to the Capitol to discuss with Senators matters of patronage, it seems to me as if he might, when he is there distributing spoils, drop a word here and there as to the importance of this bill passing.

Of course, it is not as pleasant to suggest to Senators to relinquish patronage as it is to give them patronage; but, after all, the bitter ought to go with the sweet. The needs of the country ought to be considered as well as the needs of Senators, and the President should, it seems to me, not only be active in dispensing patronage, but should also, when it is important to the country, use his influence toward diminishing patronage. It seems to me it is a reproach to the majority party, a reproach to the Democratic House and Senate and President, that this great bill, which every department of the Government is urging should pass, should be longer delayed by a little insignificant matter of patronage, and the Democratic Party in both Houses ought to see to it that some conclusion is reached on this important matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] be given five minutes more time, so that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] be granted five minutes more, so that he can interrogate him.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] take his own time.

Mr. ANTHONY. All right. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has spoken upon the question to which he has just addressed himself with so little apparent information, although I understand he is one of the conferees that have had these questions before them between the two Houses. I am surprised at the statement he has made that an insidious lobby has been at work here in the effort to prevent the cutting down of the membership of the boards of soldiers' homes from the present number to seven members.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman will notice that I did not say "insidious lobby."

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, that is what we have been speaking about. Lobbies are always "insidious" if they are against you. The only lobby that I know of that has been at work here on this matter has been a lobby headed by former Members of this House in the effort to cut down the membership of the soldiers' home board, and I want to say, for the information of the gentleman, that in my opinion one of the cheapest pieces of politics ever played on the floor of this House is embodied in that little rider which was put in the sundry civil bill in order to cut down the membership of the soldiers' home board from 12 to 7. Its real purpose is to center the control of that board into a little handful of men. It is in order to place the power or control of the Board of Managers of Soldiers' Home in the hands of a few men who have influence apparently with the Committee on Appropriations. That is a fact. The Committee on Appropriations ought to be ashamed to tie up the great sundry civil appropriation bill as long as it has on that flimsy pretext, and the conferees instead of playing petty politics on the bill should try to agree upon it and pass it and relieve the conditions into which they are plunging the country.

As a matter of fact out my way Uncle Sam is engaged in standing off his creditors to-day, and has been doing so for eight months, simply because you will not pass this bill. The thing to do is to waive the questions of petty politics and leave the law as to the Board of Managers of Soldiers' Home to stand as it is. The Senate is right in its contention.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing a statement of Mr. Edwin D. Mead, giving the utterances of several Presidents of the United States on the subject of international peace.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the motive actuating other Members of the House relative to the reduction in the membership of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, there can be no misunderstanding of the position of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] who has just spoken. His hostility to the present control of the board of managers and against reducing it, so as to eliminate certain members from it, is due to the fact that certain men on that board, who have given their time and attention and energies to attempting to make it an efficient board, have declined to permit the gentleman from Kansas to persuade them to burn coal from his district at the home in his district instead of oil, which is used at a considerable saving, as has been demonstrated from time to time.

He has twice endeavored to persuade the House to overrule the control of the board and the recommendation made by the Committee on Appropriations, in order that those in whom he is peculiarly interested may have a chance to sell coal to the soldiers' home. He has failed on both occasions, and now he criticizes the members of the Committee on Appropriations for not yielding to the Senate in this matter, although the House, after the matter had been a number of times thrashed out, insisted upon inserting in the bill the provision to reduce the number of members of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home.

Now, what are the facts, Mr. Speaker? The Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home consists of the President and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and one or two others, ex officio, and 11 members. There are 10 branches. For a number of years this branch of Congress in its investigations has come to the conclusion that under the system in vogue inefficiency results from a membership of 11 upon the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home, and several times the House has inserted a provision in the sundry civil bill reducing the number from 11 to 5.

A few years ago the Senate refused to yield because some vacancies were about to take place. Those vacancies occurred in 1912. In order to take care of the vacancies about to occur, the Senate refused to acquiesce in the attempt to make this reform, and the membership was continued at its then size. At the last session of Congress the House determined again to reduce the number to five. There were a number of items in controversy in the sundry civil bill, and in the adjustment of the differences between the two Houses the Senate yielded upon this item. When Congress convened in extraordinary session, a month or two ago, several heads of departments addressed communications to me, suggesting that certain items inserted by the Senate in that bill and agreed to by the House in the adjustment of differences should be eliminated. They did not want these items. They did not approve them. They would not recommend them. And yet the House, believing that it was proper to continue its acquiescence in the adjustment of differences that had to be made between the two Houses, passed the bill in the form in which it had been agreed upon.

Then the Senate took a different attitude. It had in the bill everything for which it had contended, and it attempted then to take back one of the things it had yielded in order to obtain what it more particularly desired. The result is that difference still exists between the two Houses.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] says it was the meanest piece of politics he has ever seen. It was peculiar politics for the Democratic House to reduce the membership in a board when it would have the opportunity to participate with a Democratic Senate in filling the places and would have eliminated any possibility of the gentleman from Kansas having any say whatever as to those who should be put on the board to fill the vacancies. Four vacancies will occur in 1914. Three exist now. Unless this provision be insisted upon, the membership of the board would be continued at 11 for about six years longer, and any attempt to make any reform or to increase the efficiency of the board would be futile.

Last winter, Mr. Speaker, the Senate appointed a subcommittee to investigate the Pacific Branch of the National Soldiers' Home at Santa Monica, Cal., and the report of that subcommittee was to the effect that the management of the home was so inefficient and the conditions so intolerable that that home should be transferred from the jurisdiction of the board of managers to the War Department. But still the Senate insists upon continuing the membership of this board at its present size.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, every attempt to effect a reform by abolishing or eliminating useless officials meets with opposition in some place or another. This House will recall that for more than 10 years it struggled and struggled in an attempt to abolish useless pension agencies throughout the country and to consolidate the payment of pensions in one agency here in Washington, effecting a great reform and increasing the efficiency of the service. In the last Congress this House asserted its power and served notice upon the Senate that it would have that reform or it would never consent to the pension appropriation bill. So far as I am concerned personally—and I hope that is the attitude of this House—having time after time proposed this reform and always being met by the same opposition, due to the desire of some particular individual to cling to an office which he does not fill with any degree of efficiency, I hope the House will now, before this session ends, serve notice on the Senate that it intends to effect this reform at this time and that it will not consent to yield its position in order to have the sundry civil bill become a law. Whenever the Senate is ready to live up to its agrement and to keep it, then the bill can become a law. Let the responsibility be placed upon those who are holding up the bill. Let us know who they are. Let them come out in the open. Let us know their reasons, and then the country can determine upon the propriety of their action.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Has the gentleman any information as to the treatment of the inmates of the old soldiers' homes? I will ask the gentleman if the sanitarium for old soldiers in South Dakota is under the control of this board?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The reason I ask that question is that I received a letter yesterday from an inmate of the sanitarium at Hot Springs, S. Dak., protesting against the treatment that the inmates of that sanitarium are receiving, claiming that the tenants there have been guilty of brutally beating inmates. I do not know whether there are any grounds for this statement or not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. This letter that I received from a citizen of my district asks to have an investigation made. If there is any foundation for the statement he makes, it certainly ought to be investigated, because he makes the statement that inmates of that sanitarium are brutally treated and neglected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should be very much shocked to have it shown that there was any justification for such a statement. The Battle Mountain Branch of the soldiers' home in South Dakota is one to which it has been the practice of recent years to send those who are entitled to membership in the soldiers' homes who are suffering either from tuberculosis or some other disease of a most serious character. I doubt very much that the management of the home was such that any of the inmates could be beaten or brutally treated. There are no guards over them, and these men are not under any surveillance of that character. They have certain police regulations.

Sometimes there are complaints from the inmates of homes because of the character of the food and treatment they receive. Many of those complaints are hardly justified. The men who apply for admission to the homes are well up in years. It is not easy to administer to their wants. They have requirements that younger men do not have. They need care that younger men do not need, and it is very easy to irritate them. Frequently complaints come that investigation shows do not justify the indictment made against the administration of a particular home. In other instances there have been complaints of conditions which have shown that there should be improvement in the control and management.

If I received such a communication as that mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois, I would send it to the president of the board of managers and ask that the matter be inquired into. I am quite certain that an investigation would be made to determine whether conditions are such as are indicated.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman tell me who the president is?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the president of the board is Mr. Wadsworth, who was for many years a Member of this House, and I can later give the gentleman the address of the board, where their office is. I would doubt if it were possible that the management of the home was such that men would be beaten. I doubt if any such conditions could exist in any of the homes. I would not wish to do an injustice to this board by intimating any such thing.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I did not want to do an injustice to the management, but I wanted to know how I could find out whether there were any grounds for the statement made in this letter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would send it to the board, and later I will give the gentleman the address.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. If these statements are true, the manager of that sanitarium ought to be prosecuted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. What is the salary of these men?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They receive no salary.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is an honorary position?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They receive their expenses, but they are not under salary.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 168.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce is hereby authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this committee had that authority in the last Congress?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. The Committee on the Department of Commerce and Labor had that authority, but since that time the committee has been divided.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am asking if that committee had the authority in the last Congress?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. It did.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LIMIT TO LOBBYING.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on the subject of lobbying.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on the subject of lobbying. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk a resolution to be read as the basis of my remarks, and after the reading I shall place it in the box to be referred to the proper committee—the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution to amend the House rules placing a "limit to lobbying."

Be it resolved, etc., That the rules of the House be amended so as to include the following provisions, which shall be known as—

"RULE XLII.

"LIMIT TO LOBBYING.

"SECTION 1. It is hereby declared to be against public policy and against the best interests of the people for any persons employed for a pecuniary consideration to act as legislative counsel or legislative agent for any person, corporation, or association to attempt personally and directly to influence any Member of the House of Representatives to vote for or against any measure pending therein, otherwise than by appearing before the regular committee thereof when in session or by newspaper publication or by public addresses or by written or printed statement, argument, or brief delivered to each Member of the House: Provided, That before delivering such statement, argument, or briefs 25 copies shall first be deposited with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and be subject to inspection, together with a statement of the age, the name of the agent, attorney, or counsel, and his or her principal, the amount of salary, if any, paid for such service, and, so far as practicable, a statement of the subject matter of any bill, if pending, or any legislation sought to be enacted; and no officer, agent, appointee, or employee in the service of the House or of the Government shall attempt to influence any Member of the House to vote for or against any measure pending therein affecting the pecuniary interests of such person, excepting in the manner authorized herein in the case of legislative counsel and legislative agents.

"SEC. 2. No person shall be an officer of the House or continue in its employment who shall be an agent for the prosecution of any claim against the Government or be interested in such claim otherwise than as an original claimant; and it shall be the duty of the Committee on Accounts to inquire into and report to the House of Representatives any violation of this section.

"SEC. 3. In case of violation of the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of this rule, the offender shall be deemed in contempt of the dignity of this House of Representatives and finally excluded from the Hall of the House of Representatives and from all committee rooms, and his name be posted in writing on the excluded list at the main entrance to the Hall of the House of Representatives; and any Member of this House thereafter willfully and knowingly communicating with such offender before final adjournment of this House shall likewise be deemed in contempt of the dignity of this House and subject to reprimand at the bar of the House in open session by the Speaker."

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, we have heard much of insidious and other lobbies until there is a likelihood of an improper method of dealing with this subject. The proposed rule which I have had read was the rule of the Oklahoma constitutional convention, over which I had the honor to preside, which convention is the pathfinder in progressive constitutional government. Nowhere, at no time, was that convention ever controlled or influenced by any dangerous lobby. There are those who would tell us that we should have a statute on this subject. Statutes, blind as they may be, might subject a citizen to a criminal prosecution that would be cruel, harsh, and unjust.

I concede that a right kind of a lobby is not only not wrong but extremely wholesome. No man who ever experienced the responsibility of legislation would deny that sometimes a lobby is absolutely necessary. I remember distinctly in that convention that we had every citizen represented except one. We had coal operators and the coal miners, the great oil operators, the laboring men, the merchant, the banker, the lawyer, the teacher, the minister of the gospel, the medical doctor, and every class of citizen except one—the dentist. The dentist did not maintain even a lobby, and when we came to write the schedule we absolutely put the dentists on one side of that State out of business, due to our ignorance of their needs. But for the fact that it was discovered before the final print, it would have been a hardship against that class of citizens.

I want to say to you now that all law and government must be founded on the conditions of the governed, and no man either in this House or in the other knows, or whoever has sat in either knew, all of the conditions of every business and every profession. No law can be as broad as the Republic that does not take into consideration every citizen in the Republic, and we must get much of that information from those who by experience in daily life understand best their own conditions.

I remember again in the first legislature of our State, over which I presided as speaker, a bill had passed the senate by unanimous vote and was backed by a labor lobby before the senate. The labor lobbyist was a miner. The bill sought to govern labor interest on the railroad. It provided in two simple sections that every locomotive operated in that State should be equipped with an electric headlight of 1,500 candlepower, capable of producing a light 70 rods, without the aid of a reflector, followed with a criminal provision for its violation.

I could see the general purpose of the bill to be to prevent wrecks and protect human lives, but I did not think the labor leader who requested the passage of this law knew the specific wants of railroad men. I knew that I did not know. I did not believe the senate knew about it. I walked down to the switch yard one day and said to an old Paddy, "I want to read you a section of law." He said, "Begorra, who are you?" I said, "This is Speaker Murray, Pat." He said, "All right." I read the first section, and old Pat began to pull his hair and he said, "If you pass that into law I will resign my job." I said, "What is the matter with it?" and he said, "Everything." I said, "I conceive the object is to prevent wrecks and to save life and property." "Yes, that is true; but does it not say every locomotive?" I said, "Yes"; and he said, "Now, suppose I am standing here in this switch, and some night a switch engine is here and one is down there, and they would proceed to meet me with these powerful lights, and I would not know whether it was on the track or not." I could see that, and I said, "What kind of an engine do you call this?" He replied a switch engine, and I asked, "Are there any other that ought not to be equipped with this light?" and he responded that a "dead" engine ought not to be equipped with it. I asked him what was a dead engine, and he said it was one going in for repairs. I then asked him if there were any other, and he said that there were; that engines operating wholly in the daylight ought not to be required to be equipped with this light. "Any other?" I asked him, and he said no. I went back to the office and dictated a proviso to the first section: "Provided, however, That switch engines, dead engines, and engines operated wholly in the daylight should not thus be required to be equipped," and I submitted that to the house. The proviso prevailed, and it was accepted by the senate.

I submit that to you, that but for the fact of that old Irishman lobbying unwillingly we would have done even the labor man an injustice; and so I say to you the man who undertakes to say that he knows all there is about life, which is the basis of legislation, is the biggest fool that ever attempted to rule a people or to legislate for them. [Applause.]

Old Solon, the world's greatest lawgiver, uttered the greatest truth of all times when, in reply to a question, "Have you given your people the best laws?" he said, "No; I have given them the best they are fitted to receive." Laws are for the period or the times, and laws must be made to meet the desires, the wishes, and the conditions of the people, even their sentiments, their heart throbs, and their social and sociological needs. When law or government is founded upon this principle it is wise, and without taking into account every citizen in the Republic we will fall short of meeting that requirement.

Now, instead of a law, why a rule? Because the House can then enforce its rules without depending, as it would be obliged under a statute, upon jurors and courts. Again, it could determine the offense, whether it was aggravated or not, and yield where lenience is required and extend punishment where that is required. I say to you that no lobby, it makes no difference what the question may be, who comes in the open and discusses the proposition in the open is a danger. Some politicians were astonished at me in the first legislature of our State when I deliberately asked Mr. Winchell, of the Rock Island Railroad, to come before the committee and tell the committee and the house what the railroad people wanted. I said that there was a community of interest between the railroad and the people if they would be fair with each other. And I said to Mr. Winchell, "We want to hear you. You can not buy us, and your representatives, when proposing to buy, will defeat your purpose. But if you will come and state in a reasonable way and by argument, and meet us face to face and on a fair, open plane, this legislature will give you what you are entitled to, and I will personally back whatever is right for your company. But, remember, you can not buy anything, and you must not try it." I hope to see the day come when railroad lobbyists or paid lobbyists of any kind will cease and that the great interests will come before the committees and before Congress and in the open and to the public say, "We want this, and we will show you why it is right"; and whatever is right, whether it be demanded by a laboring man or by men of wealth, should be enacted into law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, may I ask just two minutes longer?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I would draw, under this resolution as a proposed amendment to the rules, a method whereby the lobbyist could be registered and known, and the Members would know whom he represents, what he represents, what special legislation he is seeking to favor or defeat. There is no wrong in an open, fair, free discussion of any proposition anywhere. The insidious lobby is not the lobby that is trying to get what is their right in a fair, honest way, but is trying to do it in an improper way, or to get something he knows to be wrong.

I would welcome my constituents; and but a few days ago the farmers down on the Big Pasture, who had bought property from this Government, felt that they had paid too much and that they were unable ever to pay for it; they came to us and we called our delegation together, listened to them patiently, and in that we were doing our duty and they were better enabled to tell us their side than we could get it by any other means. So let us draw a distinction between an honest lobby and a dishonest lobby; a helpful lobby and a lobby that hinders and prevents. When we do that we can do it by a simple rule, as the Oklahoma constitutional convention did, the pathfinder, as I said in the beginning, of all progressive constitutional governments—it stood straight against all jests, gibes, all ridicule, all abuse, all vituperation and villainous slander of the corporate press, backed by a partisan judiciary in the very dawn of progressive government. When the road was hard to find and statesmen in other parts of the world were halting in doubt, groping in the dark in search of the road, Oklahoma pointed the way. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for one hour.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say I would like to have half an hour after the gentleman concludes, to speak on the subject——

Mr. PAYNE. I would suggest to the gentleman that he put it on a separate footing.

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to ask for 30 minutes at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent to address the House for one hour and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the request of the gentleman from Wyoming separately. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire if there will be any other business brought up after the gentleman concludes, in case this request is granted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of none. There were two gentlemen trying to get the eye of the Speaker when he put these requests.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Wyoming withhold his request until such matters as the Speaker may desire to have considered be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker does not desire to have any business considered, but there were two gentlemen up with papers in their hands.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I submitted my request thinking the business of the House had been disposed of; I will withhold it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think there is any business except requests for printing, but, of course, he does not know.

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to withhold my request.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the following resolution of the Chicago Association of Commerce, which is self-explanatory:

THE CHICAGO ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
Chicago, June 2, 1913.

Hon. FRED A. BRITTEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a special meeting of the executive committee of this association, held on Monday, May 19, certain proposed changes in the customs administrative law, as provided in tariff bill H. R. 3321, now pending in the United States Senate, were thoroughly considered and discussed, with the result that the following resolutions were unanimously adopted for presentation to Congress by a special committee:

"Whereas the tariff bill which has recently passed the House of Representatives and is now before the Senate (H. R. 3321) contains administrative provisions which will, if enacted into law, inaugurate new and far-reaching changes in the administration of the customs laws; and

"Whereas no opportunity has been given merchants, importers, or the public at large to present their views as to these proposed changes or to present evidence as to the manner in which the proposed changes will affect the carrying on of business: Be it

"Resolved, That the Chicago Association of Commerce respectfully urges that the proposed changes in the administration of the customs laws of the United States is a matter which deserves great consideration and in the determination of which the Senate and House of Representatives may be more fully informed by hearings, at which may be submitted complete information as to the proposed changes and the effect on the business interests of the country, and to further urge that the proposed change in the administration of the customs is not a matter of party policy; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chicago Association of Commerce respectfully urges that before the proposed changes in the manner of administering the customs laws of the United States be enacted into law full opportunity for hearings be allowed at which the views and evidence of the public at large, importers, and merchants of the country may be submitted; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Senators from Illinois, the Representatives in Congress from Cook County, Ill., and to the chairman of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate."

Very truly, yours,

THE CHICAGO ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
By HOWARD ELTING, President.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, the article I desire to place in the RECORD is one which appeared in the American Lumberman April 26, 1913, written by Hon. WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY, of the State of Washington, upon the question of American rights at Panama.

The following is the article:

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS—CLEAR RIGHTS OF AMERICAN INTERESTS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 16.

EDITOR OF AMERICAN LUMBERMAN: I have read the article in reference to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in its bearing upon the Panama Canal, by Mr. W. A. McLean, which you submitted to me for the purpose of verifying some of the statements made therein. I have taken the liberty to reply to this communication.

Not knowing Mr. McLean, I assume that he has no selfish motives in view and that he is actuated entirely by patriotic purposes. It seems to me that he makes the mistake that is generally made by those who take his side of the question, of assuming that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is in full force and effect, and by further assuming that under that treaty we agreed to treat the vessels of other countries the same as we treat our own—an assumption that, in my judgment, is entirely erroneous and not in accordance with the facts.

Starting with this assumption, Mr. McLean proceeds to make some rather ill-tempered criticisms about this country violating its sacred treaties, etc. The criticism that I would make of Mr. McLean and those who have taken a similar position is that I think that they show entirely too much eagerness to condemn and criticize their own country and to uphold the position of other nations. They should at least make some effort to obtain the real facts before engaging in such unrestricted denunciation.

He says, "But on the first evidence of such action Great Britain did object in a courteous, dignified, and most firm manner," referring to her protest against the violation of the treaty. Apparently Mr. McLean has not read the protest made by Great Britain and does not know the ground of her contention. She says now that we had no right to make our treaty with Panama, and it is true that if the treaty had been broken at all it was broken when we made our treaty with Panama, almost 10 years ago. Yet Great Britain now protests that we then violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, although for 10 years she has stood by in silence and seen us expend millions of dollars in prosecuting this great work. According to every law of justice and equity Great Britain is forever estopped to dispute our right to do what we did.

Further, Mr. McLean says that a child can understand the treaty. Perhaps this may be so, but certainly a child could not understand it without reading it, and also the other treaties relating thereto, which Mr. McLean admits he has not done.

A treaty is a contract—nothing more nor less. It is construed by the ordinary rules of law governing contracts. It is a rule of international law as well as common law and of common sense that the parties to a contract make such contract with a view to the conditions that exist at the time that such contract is executed and as to such conditions as could be reasonably anticipated at the time. This proposition is so plain that it needs no amplification. Apply this rule to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. When we made the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Great Britain and the United States, as well as the other nations of the world, believed that we would construct the canal on foreign soil. Will any sane man contend that at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made it was contemplated by either Great Britain or the United States, or could have been contemplated by either of them, that Panama would rebel, become a separate nation, and that we would purchase the strip from Panama upon which we would build the canal and then construct the canal, as we have done, not upon foreign but upon American soil?

It seems to me that the very statement of the case alone would convince anyone that, as the conditions have entirely changed, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty at once became voidable at the option of either party and that the treaty with Panama did in terms violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It took 10 years and the urging of the Canadian Pacific Railway before Great Britain had the assurance to contend that we did not have that right, and no other nation in the world has yet had the assurance to make any such assertion. If we had owned the Panama Canal strip at the time of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, does any sane man suppose that we would have entered into any treaty whatever about what we should do in regard to constructing the canal on our own soil? Can anyone pretend to believe that if Great Britain and not the United States had made this treaty with Panama and the canal strip had been British soil instead of American soil Great Britain would have permitted the United States to construct the canal upon British soil under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, giving to the United States the right to regulate such canal, to fortify it, and to protect it, and to use it for military purposes? The statement of these questions alone conclusively ends the whole controversy about our violating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, for the terms became voidable at the option of either party, and if the United States has seen fit in any way to violate any of its terms she had a perfect right so to do, as I have already pointed out, and Great Britain for almost a decade, by her silence, has admitted our right so to do.

I feel that I am stating the facts conservatively when I say that had it not been for the action of the transcontinental railways, and especially the Canadian Pacific Railway, Great Britain or no other nation would ever for a moment have questioned our right after our treaty with Panama to do with the canal whatever we saw fit. It is especially significant that we heard no protest against our using the canal in any way that we wished, so far as our own ships were concerned, until we placed a provision in the Panama Canal act which prevented railroad-owned ships from passing through the canal. This provision, being broad enough to apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway, is, in my judgment, the sole cause of the present agitation for a repeal of the clause in the present law permitting American ships in the coastwise trade to pass through the canal without the payment of tolls. I do not deem it necessary to argue this proposition further, because it seems to me that it is perfectly clear that if we have violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we had a perfect right to do so, and that we are not legally or morally or from the standpoint of natural justice in any way bound to observe it.

But in order to answer Mr. McLean further, let it be assumed that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is in full force and effect. Even then have we violated any of its provisions? The part which he quotes is a rule made by the United States and not by Great Britain and the United States. The wording of the treaty is, "The United States * * * adopts these rules." That is, the United States, the owner, the builder, the one that has paid for the canal, and the one that will govern it and protect it in time of peace and in time of war, stands upon one side, the rest of the world upon the other, and the United States says, "This is my canal and all of you that observe my rules will be treated upon terms of entire equality." Does that mean that the United States agrees to treat all the other nations in the same way that she treats herself in regard to her own property? If this is true, then the United States must ask the other nations also upon what terms we may pass our naval vessels through the canal in time of war. She must ask them upon what terms she can take troops upon the canal. If this contention be true, then a hostile nation would have the same right and could pass her fleet through our canal upon the same terms to attack and destroy us that we could pass our fleet through to protect ourselves. For, remember, the treaty is exactly the same in regard to vessels of war that it is in regard to vessels of commerce, for the wording is, "vessels of commerce and of war." If Mr. McLean is correct, then, in the name of the American people, what did we construct the canal for anyway? Suppose that Mr. McLean owned a ferryboat running across the Ohio River, and he would post up rules in regard to the running of that boat, and that rule 1 would read, "All passengers paying $1 shall be permitted to cross the river on this boat." Does that mean that Mr. McLean, the owner, the proprietor of the boat, should pay to himself $1 every time he crosses the river in his own vessel? I contend that such construction is not the construction ordinarily given to the English language. I contend that even if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is in full force and effect we had never agreed to treat the other nations as we treat ourselves, but have simply agreed to treat all other nations alike.

But if it will strengthen his case any, admit that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is open to the construction that Mr. McLean places upon it. Even then we have not in the slightest degree violated the terms of the treaty by passing our vessels through the canal in the coastwise trade free. This exact point has been conclusively settled and is no longer open to dispute, both Great Britain and the United States agreeing upon this proposition. For 100 years we have had a treaty with Great Britain which says: "That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed * * * in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels." Yet, notwithstanding that treaty, which is in full force and effect, and which is much stronger and more specific than the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Great Britain has always claimed and exercised the right to charge American vessels higher and other duties in British ports than she charged British vessels in the same ports. And to-day if an American vessel and a British vessel of exactly the same character enter a British port the American vessel pays a third higher charge than the British vessel. Great Britain exercises this right because she says that a treaty with other nations does not include the domestic trade of either party to the treaty. Does it now lie in her mouth after having followed this practice for a century to attempt to claim that we have violated the treaty for doing the same thing? If it be true that we would violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by passing our vessels through the Panama Canal without payment of tolls, even if that treaty is in full force and effect, then Great Britain has violated her treaty with us every day since 1815. This exact question, as I have said before, is no longer open to argument or conjecture, for it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen v. Smith (159 U. S., 332), in relation to the treaty above quoted, where we make the same agreement in regard to the treatment of British vessels in American ports that Great Britain makes with us in regard to the treatment of American vessels in British ports. In this case the Supreme Court of the United States followed the contention of Great Britain that domestic trade was not included in a treaty, and that we had the right to do anything we saw fit with our domestic trade, and that Great Britain could not complain because it did not in any way concern her, for she could not under any circumstances engage in our coastwise trade, and therefore could not be discriminated against by anything that we might do. That case of Olsen v. Smith, by the highest judicial body in the world and by the proper one to pass upon the question, forever disposes of the exact point involved in this controversy, whatever view may be taken of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. McLean also asks the question: "Take for example: A vessel loaded at Seattle, Wash., for New Orleans, La., according to your contention, should have the free use of the canal; a vessel loaded at Vancouver, British Columbia, for Halifax, Nova Scotia, according to your contention, should pay. Is this free and equal to all nations of the earth and without discrimination?" Of course this is free and equal treatment to all the nations of earth, because any vessel that makes any one of these voyages, no matter what nationality, would have to pay exactly the same tolls. No vessel but an American vessel would be permitted to make the trip from Seattle to any other American port. Mr. McLean makes the mistake of contending that we must treat the vessels of other nations the same as we treat American vessels engaged in coastwise trade, but as heretofore pointed out, both Great Britain and the United States have decided that no such thing is contemplated by any treaty. And I deem it unnecessary to argue that point further.

Mr. McLean says, "Are you aware that when this treaty was being framed, a clause exempting American vessels was actually written but not embodied in the negotiations, the authors well knowing that the treaty in such form would not be accepted by Great Britain?" This statement is entirely erroneous.

He is especially unfortunate when he refers to the Welland Canal. The right to use that canal is a reciprocal right entered into in the form of treaties after considerable negotiations. American vessels are permitted to use the Welland Canal only because British vessels are permitted to use the "Soo" Canal.

If Great Britain was to construct a canal across Nicaragua and then say to the United States "you can pass your vessels free through our canal if you will permit us to pass our vessels free through your canal," then we would have the exact situation we have on our northern border. But in reference to the Panama Canal Great Britain is now declaring that while we own the canal, control it, and will have to pay for it and be responsible for it, that she should get the same use of it that we do, without paying anything or bearing any of the burdens. This is neither common sense nor justice, and the American people will never submit to any such proposition, nor is there anything in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that obligates us to do anything of the kind.

This disposes of all the questions raised by Mr. McLean except one, where he declares that we should arbitrate this question. I deny that there is any justice in his position. In the first place, we are asked to submit our case to a prejudiced court—to a jury packed against us. In the next place, our arbitration treaty says that we are under no obligations to submit questions that involve our national honor or independence or "that concern the interest of third parties." I think this question vitally affects both the honor and the independence of the United States, but however we may argue upon that point, there can be no question that it concerns a third party—Panama, for one of the protests that Great Britain makes after waiting 10 years is that we have violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by permitting Panama to pass her vessels through the canal free, although Mr. McLean apparently did not know this. If the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is in full force and effect, our treaty with Panama is abrogated, as both of these treaties can not possibly be in force at the same time. Therefore it vitally affects the interests of Panama, and we have no right under the terms of our arbitration treaty to submit this question to arbitration without her consent. More than this, to submit to arbitration a question concerning our domestic affairs is to renounce sovereignty, is to declare that we are no longer a Nation. The Panama Canal is built upon American soil. It is no longer under the control of the treaty-making power, but under the control of Congress. It is our own property. The American people own it. They have paid for it. They have asked no other nation to help bear either the expense or the responsibility of its construction or maintenance, and they will never consent to ask any other nation of earth what they are going to do with their own property.

W. E. HUMPHREY.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to extend his remarks in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, early in the session I introduced the following measure to provide old-age pensions:

A bill (H. R. 4352) to provide for old-age pensions.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person in whose case the conditions laid down by this act for the receipt of an old-age pension are fulfilled shall be entitled to receive such a pension as long as those conditions continue to be fulfilled, and the receipt of an old-age pension under this act shall not deprive the pensioner of any franchise, right, or privilege or subject him to any disability.

SEC. 2. That the conditions for the receipt of an old-age pension by any person shall be as follows:

(a) The person must have attained the age of 65 years.

(b) The person must have been a citizen of the United States for the 20 years next preceding the application for a pension under this act.

(c) The person must not have had an income from any source, exclusive of the pension herein provided for, for the 12 months next preceding his application, averaging $9 per week.

SEC. 3. That a person shall be disqualified for receiving or continuing to receive an old-age pension under this act, notwithstanding the fulfillment of the above conditions—

(a) If, before he becomes entitled to a pension, he has habitually failed to work according to his ability, opportunity, or need for the maintenance and support of himself and those legally dependent on him: Provided, That a person shall not be disqualified under this paragraph if he has continuously for the 10 years previous to attaining the age of 55, by means of payments to fraternal, benefit, or other societies, or trades-unions, or other approved steps, made such provisions against old age, sickness, infirmity, or want or loss of employment as may be recognized as proper provision for the purpose; and any such provision, when made by the husband, in the case of a married couple living together, shall, as respects any right of the wife to a pension, be treated as having been made by the wife as well as by the husband.

(b) While he is being maintained in any place as a pauper or a lunatic.

(c) While he is detained in prison after conviction for a felony, and for a further period of 10 years after the date of release from imprisonment for such cause.

SEC. 4. That every person fulfilling the required conditions shall be placed upon the pension roll of the United States and be entitled to receive until death a pension from the United States Government provided by an annual appropriation from Congress. Such pension shall be graded according to the following schedule:

When the average weekly income of the pensioner as calculated under this act does not exceed $6, $4 per week; exceeds $6, but does not exceed $7, $3 per week; exceeds $7, but does not exceed $8, $2 per week; exceeds $8, but does not exceed $9, $1 per week.

SEC. 5. That in calculating the income of a person for the purpose of this act account shall be taken of—

(a) The income which that person may reasonably expect to receive during the succeeding year in cash, excluding any sums receivable on account of an old-age pension under this act, that income, in the absence of other means for ascertaining the same, being taken to be the income actually received during the preceding year.

(b) The yearly value of any advantage accruing to that person from the ownership or use of any property which is personally used or enjoyed by him.

(c) The yearly income which might be expected to be derived from any property belonging to that person which, though capable of investment or profitable use, is not so invested or profitably used.

(d) The yearly value of any benefit or privilege enjoyed by that person.

SEC. 6. That in calculating the income of a person being one of a married couple living together, the income shall not in any case be taken to be less than one-half the total income of the couple: Provided, That when both husband and wife are pensioners, except where they are living apart, pursuant to any decree, judgment, order, or deed of separation, the rate of the pension shall be three-fourths of the rates given in the above schedule.

SEC. 7. That if it appears that any person has directly or indirectly deprived himself of any income or property in order to qualify himself for the receipt of an old-age pension, or for the receipt of an old-age pension at a higher rate than that to which he would otherwise be entitled under this act, that income or the yearly value of that property shall be taken to be part of the income of that person.

SEC. 8. That any assignment of or charge on and every agreement to assign or charge an old-age pension under this act shall be void, and on the bankruptcy of a person entitled to an old-age pension the pension shall not pass to any trustee or other person acting on behalf of the creditors.

SEC. 9. That the said pension shall be paid in 13 equal installments in each year, in advance. It shall begin on the date the claim is filed, and the arrears from that time to the time of allowance shall, if the claimant be then living, but not otherwise, be paid in a lump sum.

SEC. 10. That the said pension may be increased or decreased every 12 months, whenever the pensioner's income increases or decreases, according to the terms of the schedule.

SEC. 11. That wherever in this act the masculine pronoun is used it shall be held to include the feminine pronoun also.

SEC. 12. That all claims for old-age pensions under this act shall be filed with the Department of the Interior, together with affidavits containing such statements as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest problems confronting this Nation to-day is that of old-age dependency. It is distinctly a modern problem, born of our present industrial system. In other times the worn-out worker was provided for by the master with whom he had labored as a friend rather than as a servant. But the era of gigantic factories, with the impersonal relation of employer and employee and the shifting of employment, changed the conditions and brought this problem of old-age dependency, which has become more pressing with every year.

The poorhouses and charitable institutions of this country are to-day crowded with aged men and women who performed splendid service until the weakness of age overtook them. Still others of these unfortunates beg on the streets. Others sell trifling articles or do anything they may to prevent the bitter stigma of the poorhouse being placed upon them.

When we have classed these worn-out servants of humanity as paupers, we have done an injustice. They are not paupers any more than the soldier who has no longer strength to march in the ranks can be called a deserter. They are victims of unjust conditions, and their hardships and misery are preventable by a statesmanship which will not uphold the squandering of a nation's funds for worse than useless purposes, while the aged parents of the people are forgotten in their misery and want.

They tell us that the aged Indian when he saw himself becoming a burden upon the tribe calmly selected his grave and refused to live longer. But surely in this age and in this Nation we will neither demand nor permit such sacrifice.

Year by year national legislation has had an increasing trend toward dealing with questions which affect the entire social life of the people. Government has long recognized its duty toward the child by declaring that the opportunity of free education must be given to every child within the borders of the Nation. Having recognized its duty toward those at the threshold of life, government must recognize also those at the other extremity, those whose departure can not long be postponed.

This action is one of simple justice, and it becomes imperative when it is proven that this Nation is witnessing a great and growing volume of distress due to the infirmities of old age. Boasted prosperity does not stop the human tide flowing toward old-age dependency; depression only accelerates the current. Growing more numerous are those we term "unfortunates," whose only misfortune consists in their having lived long. So vast has this distress become, so injurious to the public welfare, and its relief so expensive that there is no other problem greater than this before the American people.

Only recently has the subject been given the attention it deserves, a fact which in itself is a crying condemnation. Statistics are difficult to secure, and I believe that I have perused all the figures compiled on the question in this country. The Nation has never considered it, and the State of Massachusetts is the only State that has really made a methodical investigation of the subject. The report of the commission on old-age pensions, provided for by the legislature of that State, and which was issued in 1910, is the most authoritative work on the subject in this country.

This report states that of 177,000 persons in the State over the age of 65, 41,212 were absolutely dependent upon charity for their support. A large number of the 135,788 classed as nondependent were provided for by relatives and in other ways, and the number of dependent ones is declared to be very conservative.

The increase has been startling during the last few years, and shows that the problem is growing more and more in magnitude, and that it already has reached the place where earnest attention must be given to it. We have an army of industrial wage earners in the Nation numbering more than 18,000,000. By the calculation of investigators there are 1,250,000 persons who have reached the age of 65 in want, and must depend upon assistance for their daily needs.

It is costing each year in public and private charity the sum of $150,000,000 to take care of this army of worn-out and cast-off soldiers of peace. That means that 1 of every 18 wage-workers at least is dependent upon others for support. It means that 1 out of every 75 persons is a "dependent," and that the other 74 must provide for his maintenance and support.

The Census Bureau in its special report for 1904 on Paupers in Almshouses, emphasizes the fact that dependence is an accompaniment of old age. On page 18 the statement is made "Pauperism is largely a phenomenon of old age. It is a misfortune of old age and not of youth."

The enumeration of paupers in almshouses December 31, 1903, shows 81,764, while 81,412 were admitted during the year. Of 160,006 whose ages were known, 52,795 were 65 years of age and over. The percentage of each five-year period given in the census tables is an eloquent proof of the relation between old age and pauperism. For instance, the almshouse population under 35 years of age is 21 per cent of the whole while it is 70 per cent for the general population. The almshouse population over 65 years of age is 33 per cent of the total while it is but 4 per cent of the general population.

Of paupers admitted to poorhouses 27 per cent are 65 and over and more than half of all admitted are over 50 years of age. The report says:

> Nothing could more clearly show the fact that pauperism cared for in almshouses is largely an incident of later life.

The cause of the presence of aged persons in the poorhouses, while not the most vital point of the matter, is still a question to be considered. There are many persons who in self-satisfied manner declare that it is due to intemperance, lack of thrift, shiftlessness, and so forth, on the part of the individuals themselves.

While it can not be denied that some persons are in poverty and pauperism because they are shiftless and drunken, the fact is that these causes have been vastly magnified by those who did not care nor dare to investigate the truth. The Massachusetts report shows that of the inmates of poorhouses who had owned property at some time in their lives, only 6 per cent had lost it through intemperance. Aside from that fact, it would be worth while to seek to learn how much of intemperance and vice is due to conditions which drive hope from the hearts of men and leave only despair in its stead.

The vast majority of the aged dependents in this country are dependent because of circumstances over which they had and could have no control. The Massachusetts report shows that 60 per cent of the aged paupers who once owned property came to want because of sickness, accident, and so forth; 25 per cent because of business failures, bad investments, and so forth; and only 6 per cent because of intemperance.

These figures are typical of the conditions in the Nation, for those who have studied the conditions declare that 72 per cent of the pauperism in this country is due to misfortune. The United States Census Bureau shows that about 20,000 fatal accidents occur every year in the industries of the country, and the nonfatal accidents have been estimated at 2,000,000 each year. Eighty per cent of all these accidents are due to the professional risks of industry.

That means that at least 15,000 families are robbed of their breadwinner and left destitute and that the burden of temporary disability rests upon other countless thousands each and every year.

As regards sickness, it is estimated that 3,000,000 persons are sick every day, and the United States Bureau of Labor estimates that the average laborer in America pays $27 a year for medicine alone, without counting doctors' fees and funeral expenses, showing the enormous drain sickness makes upon the incomes of the workers of the country.

No; we can not lay as flattering unction to our souls the statement that poverty in this country is even largely due to faults of the individual. When the father is killed or maimed, when the wage earner is thrown out of employment or stricken down by preventable disease, when less than a living wage is paid workers, the poverty which follows is not to be justly charged to the individual, but is rather a bitter arraignment of the conditions which make that poverty inevitable. The truth is that the great mass of unskilled workers in this country and many of the skilled workmen face as their certain fate dependency in old age. Even though they should keep above the poverty line until the possibility of working is past, they must drop below it then, while all the time they are facing the same tragic fate through sickness, unemployment, or accident.

But in spite of these facts neither the United States nor any State has thus far taken any vital step for the remedy of distressful conditions. Every other great industrial nation of civilization has devised a pension system of some kind, voluntary or compulsory, contributory or noncontributory, based on the principle that faithful service entitles the old worker to respect and support, not charity; to justice, not pauperism.

Germany was the originator of legislation looking toward provision for old age without the taint of pauperism. Its compulsory insurance law for old age was passed in 1889. It requires all workers whose income does not exceed $476 to pay weekly contributions to the old-age fund. One thousand one hundred and forty weeks' contributions must be paid before the insured is entitled to a pension, and he must have reached the age of 70 years. The fund is maintained by contributions from employee, employer, and the Government.

Denmark followed in 1891 and made the age limit 60, with the pensioner proving that he is not able to provide the necessaries of life.

New Zealand passed an old-age pension law in 1898, making the age limit 65 and the income less than $300.

New South Wales passed a similar act in 1900. The preamble reads:

Whereas it is equitable that deserving persons who during their term of life have helped to bear the public burden of the Commonwealth by the payment of taxes and by opening up its resources by their labor and skill should receive pensions from the colony in their old age—

And so forth.

Victoria followed in 1901, making the age limit 65 years. Belgium passed a law in the same year, combining insurance and pensions, with the age limit 65. France passed a law in 1905, with combined pensions and government savings banks, and age limit of 70. Italy in 1906 passed a law providing for insurance subsidized by the Government and requiring 25 years' payments and age limit of 60. Austria passed a contributory insurance law in 1906 which provides benefits for those who have reached the age of 65. Canada in 1908 passed an old-age annuity law providing for annuities of from $50 to $600 per year. England passed an old-age pension law in 1909, with an age limit of 70 years. The Commonwealth of Australia passed a law in 1909 superseding those of the colonies. It makes the age limit 65, and its expressed purpose is "to provide old-age pensions as right and not as charity."

In fact, every European country, with the exception of Russia, has taken steps to solve the problem of old-age dependency. The plans have proved successful, of course, in varying degree, but all have met in convincing fashion the objections raised by their opponents to their passage.

Frederick L. Hoffman, an expert American investigator, visited Germany recently and reported that—

While some objections were raised to the compulsory contributions, still there is no dissenting opinion that government action has resulted in far-reaching reforms; that it has been of vast benefit to the people; and that it has come to stay.

Sir Richard Sedden, prime minister in New Zealand, in speaking of the effect of the old-age pension there said:

Until this act passed we had not encouraged our working people to be sober, industrious, and thrifty. If they happened to be unfortunate so far as work is concerned, or if illness had rendered it difficult for them to find employment, or if their wages had been very poor and unsatisfactory, we had practically condemned them to seek charitable relief in their old age. The effect of this old-age pension at 65 is to encourage habits of thrift, since there is now something for the aged worker to hope for.

Hon. Percy Alden, member of the British Parliament, in his book on "Democratic England," convincingly argues for the old-age pension from its working in England. He says:

We think very little of voting many millions for armaments, and we call such expenditures insurance against possible hostile attacks. Surely the insurance against the discomforts and miseries entailed by old age upon the poor is at least as legitimate a national charge.

It would require volumes to contain the favorable declarations of statesmen and others in the countries where old-age dependency is being met as a national problem. Suffice it to say that old-age pensions have proved successful in every country where they have been put into operation. They have come to stay because they ought to stay.

But while every other civilized nation has been considering and acting upon this question the United States has been a laggard. In spite of the fact that Thomas Paine, one of the founders of this Republic, strongly advocated old-age pensions in his "Rights of Man," and other patriots have followed him through the years, this Nation has never yet taken action.

It may be safely said, however, that it can not be much longer delayed. The principle has been admitted in our poor laws that those who can not support themselves have a claim upon society for the means of existence. It is more a question of method than of principle, and before many years we will admit that no Government can neglect its aged work people and still be just, and the Government that is not just can not be stable nor secure. I am convinced that this Nation will not much longer stand for the relegating of worn-out workers to the poorhouse where "men sit and hear each other groan."

But facing the conditions of to-day we find in some quarters bitter opposition to the principle of old-age pensions. It is based on different ground, though the object is the same. First, there is the element fundamentally opposed to the entire idea that the Nation owes a duty to worn-out workers aside from maintaining poorhouses. This class sees in poverty nothing but the consequences of shiftlessness and intemperance and poor management. Secure in the posessions they have wrested from fate under existing conditions, they talk of the doctrine of noninterference with natural laws. They declare that government has no right to interfere in matters of this kind, that a government's only duty is to act as a policeman.

This class believes that all things old are sacred and all things new are dangerous. They believe that the men and women and children living in the slums of our cities are there because they revel in dark rooms and foul alleys and have neither the desire nor ability for improvement. It is the attitude of the stark individualist, with his Ishmael-like philosophy, that in the selfish struggle for existence, every man for himself, can ultimate good be accomplished. It is so preposterous in the light of its climax in the billionaire and countless paupers that it would seem untenable in this age; but the fact is that it is held by many persons, and is a theory which must be met in the advocacy of all measures which would make of government a tool for the promotion of the public welfare as well as a policeman's club.

These extreme individualists talk much of natural conditions, but the fact is that the "natural conditions" so greatly emphasized by them do not exist anywhere in a civilized state. The state of nature is not found even in our fertile fields of hay and grain, our orchards, and our flocks and herds of domesticated animals. Man has not allowed nature to have its course; he has modified the development of plants and animals, and in new and multiplied forms they are serving mankind.

What then shall we say of man-made conditions in society and government? Is government to stand aside while the strong crush the weak and unjust burdens are piled upon the shoulders of helpless ones? That argument would, if carried to its logical conclusion, end most disastrously to those propertied ones who urge its claims to-day. It would prevent the passage of a single law to restrain the highwayman, who with his weapon in hand compels the luckless pedestrian to surrender his money or his life. It would give force to the doctrine that might is right; it would follow its doctrine of the survival of the fittest to its logical end.

This cry of "Let natural conditions work out the problem" is mockery under the conditions. A new situation has arisen, complex circumstances have taken the place of the simple conditions of a past era. The Nation is a web and woof of citizenship, and a single torn thread mars the whole fabric. The interdependence of the elements in this Nation makes action by a power greater than all of them imperative. Government must assume duties which were unnecessary in the past because of the development of a rapidly changing society.

The course of legislation for many years shows how great is the field for governmental action. Providing for the public schools, penalizing the adulteration of foods, regulating hours of labor for women, prohibiting child labor, stamping out contagious diseases among animals, inspecting the work of slaughterhouses, looking after sanitary conditions, all these are eloquent witnesses to the government activities which are to-day universally commended, but which met with the most bitter opposition at their inception on this same ground of interference with the course of nature.

The argument of paternalism was invoked against those measures just as it is against old-age pensions. It shows an absolute ignorance of the meaning of paternalism, since there can be no paternalism in a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. Measures advancing the public good, then, are only evidences of the principle of self-help, the imposition of laws upon the people by the people themselves.

And to those who talk so glibly of the laws of nature, I would suggest that the most natural thing in the world is for people to struggle to secure justice. The history of the world is a history of mankind struggling against injustice in pursuance of an ideal implanted in its breast by Almighty God. The pursuit of justice always has been the aim of American patriots; it always will be their desire until it be attained, and it will not be finally attained in this Nation until the worn-out workers of America are assured a living in their old age free from the blighting brand of pauperism.

But other opponents of the old-age pensions declare that government should not assume the burden since private instrumentalities will meet the need. They say that employing corporations should maintain old-age pension funds, or that labor unions, fraternal societies, retirement funds, and so forth, will solve the problem and meet the need. This argument can be easily analyzed, and we can see just how much these plans can accomplish, for they have all been tried in this country. As far as corporation funds are concerned, the plan is unjust, since it places labor in a servile position, restricts the mobility of labor, and would prove a most fragile support in case of failure of the corporation, leaving the aged employee without the support he had confidently counted upon for years.

But let us look at the history of all these plans in this country. The facts are procurable to all and will answer the contention. A number of railroads have founded railroad relief funds. They consist of two kinds, the contributing and noncontributing. In the contributing the employee must pay dues for a large number of years, and he forfeits all rights when he becomes in arrears through any cause. In the noncontributing system the railroad companies supply the funds, but they require conditions which few men can meet. Employees must have been in the constant employ of the company for long periods, and they must have been loyal to the company under all circumstances. The companies refuse also to admit any rights to a pension, claiming the privilege of granting or refusing a pension at will. All the railroad funds in the country, as given in the census report, provided in the year reported for but 2,306 beneficiaries.

Then there are 461 establishment funds in this country contributed by the employees of individual establishments. They provided for 14 aged workers in the year reported.

There are a number of industrial benefit societies composed of workers in certain lines and not dependent on labor unions. In the year reported they cared for 15 aged persons.

The Carnegie pension fund of the United States Steel Corporation is in a class by itself among these plans. Its pensions are provided from a fund of $12,000,000 contributed jointly by Carnegie and the Steel Corporation. During its history it has provided for 1,606 persons, according to its own report.

The labor unions have not solved this problem. They can not solve it, and we have no right to expect them to even try to solve it. They have no means, save through dues collected, to establish old-age pension funds, and they can not successfully add such dues to those already required from the membership for the purposes of maintenance. The Government figures show that of 125 national and international labor unions in this country only 4 have a fund for old-age benefits. These 4 provided for 429 persons during the year reported out of a total membership of hundreds of thousands.

In their necessary conditions these fail to meet the need for provision for old age. They must require members to have paid dues for many years, they must have passed physical examinations, and they must not be in arrears at any time. These requirements, aside from the fact that labor unions only have a membership of 2,000,000 workers out of 18,000,000, preclude relief even in their own membership for those who need it most.

Besides these there are 530 local labor organizations in this country, but none have old-age pension funds and only 6 provide for permanent disability benefits. These 6 organizations, in the year reported, paid allowances for 106 persons.

These plans on the part of corporations and labor organizations provided in one year for 3,425 aged workers who had given their lives to faithful industrial service. The number is so small that it is pitiful when we realize that only 1 out of every 400 dependent persons of 65 years of age and over were taken care of through these means. They can not and they should not attempt to solve the question of old-age dependency in this Nation.

Other plans have proved equally weak and inefficient. Fraternal societies can not cope with the problem. Aside from the fact that their membership includes but a small percentage of those likely to need help in old age, they are required to raise the necessary funds entirely through dues collected. That means that men and women must pay from their earnings through a long series of years before they can possibly hope to reap a benefit, and I propose to show a little later that such a requirement is absolutely impossible of fulfillment by those who need provision in old age in the greatest degree. Out of 182 fraternal benefit societies in this country but 42 have any provision at all for old-age relief, and they touch the problem in the most distant way.

Municipal pensions in some cities provide for policemen and firemen, but they touch only a small fraction of the question. They concern workers who receive wages vastly above the average and they require payments of regular dues from monthly salaries.

Teachers' retirement funds, as organized in certain cities, fall under the same category. Well paid while employed, teachers are far better able than the average person to pay dues for a long period on the possibility that they will need help in the days of old age.

Private insurance companies have never in any way met the need. They can be of advantage only to those who are able to keep up payments for a long period, and that is an impossibility for those who need the relief most and who have worthily earned it.

State insurance plans have been put in operation in Massachusetts and Wisconsin, but they have not been entirely successful, and they also aim only to help those who can pay assessments through a long period of years.

These plans are the only ones ever attempted in this country to assure an existence in old age for faithful workers with no taint of charity upon it. The most cursory examination shows how far short they have come in coping with old-age dependency and proves that they can not hope to solve the problem, even if the problem were theirs to solve. They demand the impossible, and the average worker in this Nation is debarred from ever taking advantage of their provisions.

But then there come other opponents of old-age pensions and they have an entirely different viewpoint from the individualists. They recognize the great boon of an old age free from pauperism, and they are willing that the Government shall assist in that culmination. But they declare that thrift on the part of the individual must be a vital factor of the question. They advocate State savings banks by which they would stimulate thrift and provide annuities for old age. Or they advocate compulsory thrift, with weekly payments taken from wages, to be returned again as pensions in old age. Some of the European countries and Canada have based their plans on such a basis.

These plans bring up the reason for the total failure of the organizations already in existence to solve the problem. In the first place, these advocates take for granted that the thrift which lays up funds for old age is the wisest and best under the existing conditions. They forget that there is a very vital relation between thrift and income.

The fact of the matter is that the working people of this country have many wiser as well as more imperative ways of using their money, even if they should have a surplus. The average laborer in this country is dependent on his daily income for the support of himself and family. Even though he should be able to save something from his wages, is it wise to irrevocably appropriate those savings for provision for a long-distant future? What of the education of his children and the preparation for imminent perils, such as unemployment, sickness, accident, and so forth? The workers o this country at least have answered that query when societies paying benefits for temporary disability number their members by the million, while there are practically none collecting dues for the payment of old-age benefits.

Then, again, I would like to ask how cases are to be treated when payments can not be kept up in these contributory plans? If it is decided that workers may stop payments and draw out the amount due them on account of past payments, the whole purpose of providing for old age fails. The poorest paid workers will always find times when they have imperative and immediate need for the money saved through these means. Under such a course only the more prosperous and self-reliant will be aided, and the ones really in need of aid will be left without it.

But supposing that the other course is taken and all rights are forfeited as the result of payments left unpaid. That increases the incentive to keep up the payments, but it does not give the power, and that is the vital point in most of the plans already considered

It has been stated by the best authorities that $600 is the minimum income which will provide the actual necessaries of life for a family of five in the United States in all industries ouside of agriculture. This figure is given by Prof. J. A. Ryan in his book "A Living Wage." I am sure that it falls far short of the minimum requirement in the great industrial districts, but we can accept it as at least not an exaggerated figure. Prof. Ryan has taken the census reports, and after exhaustive study and tabulation has shown that over 10,000,000 of the 18,000,000 industrial workers of this country receive less than $600 a year.

The average income of 35,000,000 employees in 1910 was $433. Omitting the agricultural pursuits and including all salaries with the wages, the average income was $609 a year. Such figures go far to prove the contention of Robert Hunter that "not less than 10,000,000 persons are in poverty in this Nation; that is, they may be able to get a bare subsistence, but they are not able to obtain those necessities which will permit them to maintain a state of physical efficiency."

They also bear out the statement of Prof. Lee Welling Squier, probably the best authority on this subject in this country, when he says, in his work on Old Age Dependency:

> It is apparent that tens and hundreds of thousands of the wage earners of the United States have individual and family incomes which are less than a living wage, and that those who survive the vicissitudes of a hand-to-mouth existence until old age is reached will surely take their places in the great army of the aged, dependent poor.

So it is clear that any plan for solving this problem that includes so-called thrift, whether it be voluntary or compulsory, is impracticable, since the average laborer can save nothing—has nothing to save from. Though he work ever so hard and ever so long he can not make ends meet in the struggle for daily existence, and the task of laying up funds for a long-distant future is beyond his utmost endeavor.

But to those who insist upon contributions from the workers I would suggest that as long as we have taxes upon commodities that are consumed by every family in the land there can be no such thing as a noncontributing scheme. The workers of the Nation through a long series of years have been contributing largely to the revenues of the Government, and a pension in old age is but a return of a portion of their contributions.

Then, there are objections raised to old-age pensions on the ground that it would lay an overwhelming burden of expense upon the Government and tax its resources to the uttermost. Such statements are misleading, for the fact is that the establishment of old-age pensions as provided in this bill is to be urged not only from the standpoint of humanity, but from the standpoint of economy as well.

Counting the war pensions paid to persons of 65 years of age and over and the public and private charity funds for the care of persons of that age, the sum of $180,000,000 is being spent every year in this country. The veterans of the Civil War are decreasing in greater numbers with every passing year, and in the nature of things the last survivor will soon have heard the last bugle call which summons him to the Great Beyond. The sum now used in paying war pensions to those of 65 years of age and over could then be transferred to the fund for the pensioners of peace without an added cent of taxation being levied.

The cost of maintaining poorhouses and benevolent institutions for persons of 65 years and over to-day, if transferred to the old-age pension fund would be an act of humanity and wisdom and economy. Figuring that there are 1,250,000 aged dependents in this country who would come under the provisions of this bill, and that each one would receive the maximum pension of $4 a week, the expense would be but slightly greater than the present haphazard, cruel, and unsatisfactory method of dealing with old-age dependency.

But aside from all that, I am convinced that the expense will not prevent the adoption of a governmental pension plan for the retired industrial army here any more than it did in England. Our new income-tax law, brought to the provisions of the English law, would yield $400,000,000 of revenue. Besides that, the day is not far distant when an inheritance-tax law will be passed in this country, if for no other reason than to prevent collossal fortunes from remaining intact through generations and forming a perpetual menace to free institutions.

There are some who urge the argument that has been advanced against every great humanitarian measure ever proposed in this Nation—that it is unconstitutional. Their forerunners declared that the Nation could not grow by purchase, as in the case of the Louisiana addition, because it was unconstitutional. They declared in 1860 that the Nation could not save its own life by putting down rebellion, because it was unconstitutional. To-day they forget that one of the fundamental purposes of the Constitution, as expressed in the preamble, is to promote the general welfare, and that the task of providing for the aged workers of this Nation in justice is one which might well occupy the mind of everyone who believes that the noblest motive is the common good.

But the Supreme Court has more and more noticeably in the past few years been handing down decisions which tend to throw light upon this question. It has decided that the taxing power may be used for the purpose of not only relieving but of preventing pauperism. In the North Dakota cases it said:

> If the destitute farmers of the frontier of North Dakota were now actually in the almshouses of the various communities in which they reside, all the adjudications of the courts, State or Federal, upon this subject could be marshaled as precedents in support of any taxation, however onerous, which might become necessary for their support. But is it not also competent for the legislature to make small loans, secured by prospective crops, to those whose condition is so impoverished and desperate as to reasonably justify the fear that unless they receive help they and their families will become a charge upon the counties in which they live?

Then there is an array of decisions which refuse to apply in charitable cases the rule that the private character of the benefit necessarily makes the character of the purpose itself of a private nature.

The Supreme Court, in the sugar bounty cases, said:

> Debts of the United States, to pay which Congress may by the Constitution levy and collect taxes, include moral as well as legal obligations. Payments to individuals, not of right or of a merely legal claim, but payments in the nature of gratuity, yet having some feature of moral obligations to support them, have been made by the Government by virtue of acts of Congress appropriating the public money ever since its foundation. Some of the acts were based upon considerations of pure charity.

In the same case the court further said:

> In regard to the question whether the facts existing in any given case bring it within the description of that class of claims which Congress can and ought to recognize as founded upon equitable and moral considerations, and grounded upon principles of right and justice, we think that generally such question must in its nature be one for Congress to decide for itself. Its decision recognizing such a claim and appropriating money for its payment can rarely, if ever, be the subject for review by the judicial branch of the Government.

The question of the constitutionality of such legislation as this was discussed exhaustively by Miles M. Dawson, counselor at law and consulting actuary, of New York, in his brief filed with the Federal Commission on Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation on June 14, 1911. This brief is printed with the report of the commission. It takes up the question as to whether a tax may be levied for such a purpose under the Constitution, and cites numerous decisions to prove that it may. He then takes up the question as to whether the money may be disbursed for such a purpose. He cites the numerous bounties voted and paid by the Government many times and from an early date, among them being for the relief of sufferers by fire, earthquake, Indian depredations, overflow of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, cyclones, yellow fever, grasshoppers, lack of seed by failure of crops, or from accidents at arsenals.

Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, after an exhaustive review of the authorities, concludes that the power to appropriate is coextensive with the purpose for which the tax may be laid and collected.

The following are among his statements regarding this subject:

> SEC. 923. * * * But then, it is said, if Congress may lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare, the money may be appropriated for those purposes, although not within the scope of the other enumerated powers. Certainly it may be so appropriated; for if Congress is authorized to lay taxes for such purposes it might be strange if, when raised, the money could not be applied to them. That would be to give a power for a certain end and then deny the end intended by the power.
>
> SEC. 924. * * * The only real question is whether, even admitting the power to lay taxes is appropriate for some of the purposes of other enumerated powers (for no one will contend that it will, of itself, reach or provide for them all), it is limited to such appropriations as grow out of the exercise of those powers. In other words, whether it is an incident to those powers, or a substantive power in other cases, which may concern the common defense and the general welfare. If there are no other cases which concern the common defense and general welfare except those within the scope of the other enumerated powers, the discussion is merely nominal and frivolous. If there are such cases, who is at liberty to say that, being for the common defense and general welfare, the Constitution did not intend to embrace them? The preamble of the Constitution declares one of the objects to be to provide for the common defense and to promote the general welfare; and if the power to lay taxes in express terms is given to provide for the common defense and general welfare, what ground can there be to construe the power short of the object, to say that it shall be merely auxiliary to other enumerated powers and not coextensive with its own terms and its avowed objects? One of the best established rules of interpretation, one which common sense and reason forbid us to overlook, is that when the object of a power is clearly defined by its terms or avowed in the context it ought to be construed so as to obtain the object and not to defeat it. The circumstance that, so construed, the power may be abused is no answer. All powers may be abused; but are they then to be abridged by those who are to administer them or denied to have any operation? If the people frame a constitution, the rulers are to obey it. Neither rulers nor any other functionaries, much less any private persons, have a right to cripple it because it is, according to their own views, inconvenient or dangerous, unwise or impolitic, of narrow limits or of wide influence.
>
> SEC. 925. Besides, the argument itself admits that "Congress is authorized to provide money for the common defense and general welfare." It is not pretended that when a tax is laid the specific objects for which it is laid are to be specified or that it is to be solely applied to those objects. That would be to insert a limitation nowhere stated in the text. But it is said that it must be applied to the general welfare; and that can only be by an application of it to some particular measure conducive to the general welfare. This is admitted. But, then, it is added that this particular measure must be within the enumerated authorities vested in Congress (that is, within some of the powers not embraced in the first clause), otherwise the application is not authorized. Why not, since it is for the general welfare?
>
> SEC. 975. The other question is whether Congress has any power to appropriate money, raised by taxation or otherwise, for any other purposes than those pointed out in the enumerated powers which follow the clause respecting taxation. * * *
> SEC. 976. The reasoning upon which the opinion adverse to the authority of Congress to make appropriations not within the scope of the enumerated powers is maintained has been already, in a great measure, stated. * * * The controversy is virtually at an end if it is once admitted that the words "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" are a part and qualification of the power to lay taxes; for then Congress has certainly a right to appropriate money to any purposes or in any manner conducive to those ends.

The decisions are clear and to the point and indicate the general attitude of the Supreme Court on questions somewhat of the nature of old-age pensions. But there are many precedents for the power of Congress in this matter. It has granted bounties for the encouragement of manufactures, for educational institutions, for the distribution of seeds; surely it has the right to grant money for such a purpose as providing for old age. Congress has used its resources for the benefit of citizens, as in the case of its public lands; it has, through homestead acts, given valuable tracts to citizens who would occupy them, and, in the case of soldiers, has granted them outright. The police powers of Government have been greatly enlarged in recent decisions, and the Supreme Court, in the case of the Noble State Bank against Haskell, said:

> It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the great public needs.

Surely to protect the health, morals, and mind of a citizen against the injury resulting from poverty in old age is as important as to protect his life against the assassin, his body against the bully, or his money against the thief. But, I take it, too, that this Congress is not to be bound in its action by the captious pleas of unconstitutionality. The legislative department is responsible for passing measures consistent with justice and the advancement of the common welfare. If another department sets those measures aside, it is responsible for its action. We may rest assured that in this case, as in every other vital problem in the history of the Nation, the people will not consider the question until it is settled right.

I have tried to point out every argument used against old-age pensions and to show their weakness. But stronger than any argument I might make in answer, I want to point to the answer furnished by the countries where old-age pensions are in actual operation. The practical working of the plan answers every objector and gives the facts instead of theories and suppositions.

Old-age pensions do not discourage thrift, but, as the prime minister of New Zealand puts it, has encouraged thrift by giving the workers something to hope for and by putting courage in their breasts. And remember the words of President Harrison:

> When the wage earners of this land lose hope, when the star goes out, after that anarchy or a czar.

Old-age pensions do not disintegrate the family, but have the opposite effect, and the aged parent or grandparent who can help support the home in which he finds refuge is a blessing instead of a burden. Our own Civil War pensions have not broken up families; they have cemented them, while it has been left to the poorhouses to disintegrate the family.

Old-age pensions have not had mischievous political effects, but have rather helped to teach the people that they had a substantial share in government; that the Government is, in fact, themselves, and that in seeing that justice is done, no more and no less, they were attending strictly to their own business.

No; the objections have been weighed in the balance and found wanting in other countries. That they will meet the same fate here can not be doubted.

I urge the adoption of this measure because it is the only just method of dealing with the problem. The Nation must act, for it is not a State question. The Massachusetts report, to which I have previously referred, says in concluding:

> If any general system of old-age pensions is to be established, it should be done by the National Congress and not by State legislation.

Contributory plans will not meet the need, for they do not reach the poorest paid workers, the ones who need help the most and who have, in fact, made contributions all their lives to the Government revenues, and thus have a right to demand of the Government an existence in old age without the taint of pauperism.

This bill which I have introduced makes the pension fund a national charge, and no contribution is demanded from the pensioner. The receipt of an old-age pension does not deprive its recipient of any franchise, right, or privilege, nor does it inflict upon him any disability whatever.

It is not a measure of charity; it is a measure of justice. It is a legislation inspired by the spirit of humanity—yes—but also by economy and good business judgment, for it works good to all and evil to none. It is a legislation which will assuage misery and reduce agony, bringing peace and comfort to those who need it most and have earned it best. It is a legislation to protect the weak and the needy, not by an appeal to pity, but by an appeal to right and justice. It is a legislation which aims to carry out that fundamental purpose for which this Government was founded—the promotion of the common welfare.

It is not the purpose of this measure to lavish largess upon those who deserve only condemnation. The poverty and misery due to degeneracy and vice will always exist as inevitable punishment for misdeeds, and no right-thinking person would wish to attempt to legislate it out of existence. But this measure will provide for those who reach the helpless days of old age in poverty as the result of social wrongs and through no fault of their own. They are the victims of circumstances over which they have no control; their misery is due to the neglect of the very fundamentals of justice on the part of society, and that society owes a sacred obligation in the matter.

Only those will be benefited who have amply earned it. It affects only those who have through long years helped to maintain the material welfare of the Nation and who have given its riches and strength. Though hard pressed even in their prime, they have been faithful and hard working and have carried their burdens cheerfully and without complaint. I know something of great industrial districts and I have been brought into contact with phases of everyday life which some public officials never see. I am free to say that the most remarkable thing about the situation as regards those on the margin, and there are unhappily more of them every year, is their courage in the bitter battle which life means for them. The most pathetic sight I have ever seen was not the mangled body carried from the mills to the stricken home. It was the silent tragedy of the heroism of those who were trying with all their might to make ends meet in the face of overwhelming odds. I can show you that sight in countless homes in the greatest industrial district in the world. I count the truest sympathy not the pity at misfortune and want but the fellow feeling with such courage and the desire to make it impossible that that courage and heroism shall be displayed in vain. We are doing that when we demand when the days of weakness come and the burdens of toil can no longer be borne, that those burdens be lifted from bending shoulders, that it shall not be a crime for men and women to grow venerable and old and be compelled to bear indignity and humiliation simply because they have lived long.

Present industrial conditions demand our action. The great mass of workers are precluded by pitiless necessity from laying up funds to provide for old age. Unemployment, sickness, accident are ever close at hand, and the coming of any one of them means tragedy. It means the use of any surplus and more oft-times, and the debt which generally follows such misfortunes hangs like a dead-weight about the neck of labor.

I realize that the disease should also be treated as well as the symptoms, and that this bill has no necessary relation with the cure of the disease which makes poverty in old age inevitable. Other measures must deal with that question, but in this we can relieve present-day evils, and that is also a worthy aim of legislation and statesmanship. None of the plans proposed, aside from old-age pensions, can meet the need. The public charity system is inadequate and unjust. In the poorhouses of the country the upright, honest, and industrious man or woman is placed with those whose vicious lives have brought them to poverty and disease. Little wonder that the self-respecting worker chooses death rather than such a fate, and it is vastly to his credit that such is the case.

To leave these faithful ones in their old age to the mercy of private corporations is unworthy of the civilization of to-day. To place the responsibility upon voluntary associations is cowardly and unjust, for they can not carry the responsibility and we have no shadow of right in expecting it. The burden can not be shifted to the States, for it is preeminently a national question and the Nation is the only authority that can or should deal with it.

If passed, this measure will mean that no longer shall the burning badge of failure be hung about the necks of the industrious in their old age, while they are loathed and despised as burdens upon the public and forced to endure degradation and torture worse than death. Faithful service will not be rewarded with a cell in the poorhouse little better than a criminal's, which is the punishment decreed for those who have lived long and come to want.

This bill enacted into law would abolish the crime of old age and would give to accumulated years of faithfulness its due tribute of reward and support. It would be a glimpse of heaven's light for that innumerable company of aged persons whose daily bread is a gift from strange hands. Hundreds of them, seeing the notice of the introduction of this bill in the newspapers, have written to me regarding it, and the little stories from real life are more pathetic than any tragedy ever enacted by mimic characters upon a stage. This legislation will put hope into the hearts of such as these, the ones who cower in the terror of poverty in old age. It will inspire those of younger years who fear the coming of that terror. It will give them a new love of country and make the Nation one wherein duties are regarded as well as rights, obligations as well as interests, welfare as well as warfare.

Those are the aims of this legislation, and they are well worthy of the highest and best statesmanship in this Nation. Their accomplishment in the triumph of the principle of old-age pensions will be one of the greatest strides America has ever made toward fulfilling her destiny—a Nation that stands as a synonym for justice, whose altar is consecrated to humanity, and whose welfare and perpetuity rest upon the affection and love of its people.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming for one hour? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] that he may follow the gentleman from Wyoming for 30 minutes?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the second request, for the information of the House I would like to know what the gentleman from Minnesota is to talk about.

Mr. STEENERSON. Agriculture.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, having been granted an hour, I do not want to be ungracious, but I think it is entirely possible that if the House is in a willing frame of mind I may ask for a few minutes in addition to the hour, and I want to know if the gentleman from Minnesota would object.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; as long as it is not taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] for 30 minutes after the gentleman from Wyoming gets through? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, June 5, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] addressed the House on a resolution he had introduced for an investigation of the Forest Service. During the course of his remarks he severely criticized the acts of those influential, one time or another, in the Forestry Service and made some very emphatic and rather startling statements as to the character and effect of certain features of national forest reserve policies, past and present. On the following day the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] made a speech in reply to certain assertions made by the gentleman from Washington the day before. In the course of his remarks the gentleman from Kansas said that the gentleman from Washington "virtually advocated the abandonment of the policy of national conservation," and further on in his remarks the gentleman said, in substance, that the leaders of the Republican Party had never had any sympathy with the principle of "conservation," had been and were opposed to it, and would if they had the opportunity entirely overthrow it.

Being somewhat interested in knowing just what the gentleman meant by "conservation," I interrogated him as follows:

The gentleman uses the word "conservation." Is it the gentleman's purpose to define what he means by "conservation," in order that we may understand what it is he is discussing?

To which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] replied:

I will say that I intend to deal with the forestry proposition.

It is my present purpose to also discuss briefly some features of our national forestry policy, and also certain other matters relating to the public domain which are sometimes grouped under the head of "conservation."

The gentleman from Kansas did not define "conservation" at my request. He would probably experience some difficulty in giving a definition which would be acceptable to all of those who most frequently and glibly employ that term. But whatever it is, he says the Republican Party is against it. While I do not pretend to speak for the Republican Party as a whole, I desire to make some observations as to my personal views relative to some things that have been done in the name of conservation, and I think I shall have no difficulty in making it quite clear that the Republican Party and the members of that party are entitled to the credit for most that has been done in the way of a reasonable and proper use and conservation of the Nation's resources.

On the other hand, I think it can be made perfectly clear that some who have most conjured in the name of conservation and have had the most to say about it have, consciously or otherwise, been the enemies of a wise conservation, permanent and useful to the people, through proper protection and use of the Nation's resources: First, by advocating and promoting the withdrawal from use of needed resources; second, by defending rather than seeking to reform faults of administration; third, by advocating impracticable and unworkable legislation; and, fourth, by opposing legislation without regard to its merits which does not have the O. K. of certain influences.

CONSERVATION AS A FETISH.

I know of nothing more unfortunate in the political history of the past few years—I can not think of anything much less defensible—than the way in which the word "conservation" and a certain nebulous undefined theory so labeled has been used to boost private ambition, to exploit extravagant and impracticable propositions, to defend maladministration, and to prejudice the public mind, without argument or reason, for or against men or measures.

From the standpoint of the man who makes a fetish of conservation every fault of administration, every criticism of policies or measures, is fully answered by the simple process of damning as an anticonservationist him who has the temerity to criticize acts or policies. And these same gentlemen are always on the hair trigger to condemn and oppose or exalt and support men or measures according as they receive or are denied the conservation brand by the high priests of the cult.

PROGRESSIVES AND CONSERVATIVES.

I doubt if the gentleman from Kansas, looking for issues, will, after mature consideration, conclude to appropriate for his party every proposition, policy, and suggestion, however extreme, extraordinary, burdensome, or quixotic, made in the name of conservation. If he does, I assume he will consider it necessary for him to prove, to his own satisfaction at least, that the party of which he was long a member, which aided him with its support, has been and is consummately wicked in everything that appertains to or can be brought within the purview of the tremendously elastic term with which he proposes to conjure.

In connection with these matters I have just one or two suggestions to make. The first is that he will have no difficulty whatever in appropriating to himself and retaining for his party, if he desires it, all of the questionable credit to be secured through the defense and advocacy of certain things that have been done and certain things that have been proposed in the name of conservation. Neither the Republican nor the Democratic Party, nor any informed member of either, will, in my opinion, dispute with him a complete monopoly of support and approval of some of the acts and some of the proposals performed and proclaimed in the name of conservation.

Second. As I see with the eye of prophecy the no-distant day when the gentleman from Kansas and most of his now devoted followers will be endeavoring to feel once more perfectly at home and comfortable in the Republican band wagon, I realize that their comfort and enjoyment will not be enhanced by the recollection of charges or declarations, with flimsy foundation, hurled against the Republican Party.

THE FORESTRY POLICY.

In answering the speech of the gentleman from Washington the gentleman from Kansas seemed to admit many of the statements made and to make an effort to excuse the Forest Service on a plea of confession and avoidance. Being really a better conservationist than the gentleman from Kansas, without having made claims in that direction, I want to suggest that as much force as there is in many of the facts related by the gentleman from Washington, I doubt if all the inferences he draws from them are fully justified. I do not pretend to be personally informed as to the workings of the Forest Service in the State of Washington, but from some knowledge of the general situation it is my opinion that the service is perhaps not wholly to blame for the fact that the sales of timber in Washington are, compared with the amount the Government owns, pitiably small, for, undoubtedly, much of the forest is inaccessible. That the policy heretofore followed has not, however, been altogether a wise one is evidenced by the fact, to which the gentleman from Kansas called attention the other day, that very recently the service had largely increased its sales and contracts.

ARGUMENT OF SERVICE NOT SOUND IN ALL CASES.

The argument of the Forest Service in support of the policy of asking as high a price for stumpage as that asked or received by private holders of timber lands and thus restricting sales, to wit, that any reduction they might make would simply benefit the purchaser of the timber, who would not pass the benefit on to the consumer, is undoubtedly sound as it applies to certain regions and conditions; but that it is not defendable under all conditions I have pointed out on the floor in years past in relation to specific cases, cases in which the people of my State, my constituents, have been compelled to pay higher prices for their lumber than they would have paid, had the lands been in private ownership or, had the Government sold the stumpage at what had been the prevailing price before the Government established a monopoly.

Whether or no the bureau can justify its present stumpage rate in Washington I do not know. I have heard no serious complaint in my State along this line for some time past, but I think all will agree that as a general proposition it is the duty of the Government to use its enormous holdings with a view of keeping down prices rather than as though the Government were one of the timber barons, and the biggest of them all, selling its timber at the highest price it will command in virtual combination with other owners.

RESERVES INCREASE VALUE OF PRIVATE HOLDINGS.

There is no blinking the fact that the present ownership by the Government in reservation of vast areas of valuable timberland has had the effect of steadying and increasing timberland values generally, of raising stumpage values above what they would be if the Government were still disposing of its lands at a nominal figure, and the extent to which our forestry policy does this depends in a large degree upon the policy pursued in making sales.

It is true, therefore, that in a certain very important sense the inclusion of vast areas of valuable timberland in the Northwest States in forest reserves has steadied and increased the value of the lands held by the great timber barons. One does not need to be an expert in forestry to be able to realize that fact as being inevitable. This fact is not, however, necessarily one that condemns the policy of forest conservation, nor is it proof of the fact that it is unwise to hold these great timbered tracts in public ownership. It does, however, illustrate clearly why certain large timberland owners have been favorable to the Government holding vast areas in reserve. Having acquired large holdings themselves, they naturally prefer to have the Government hold the remainder rather than to have it in private ownership without adequate fire protection and increasing competition.

POLICY SHOULD BE TO SELL SO AS TO KEEP DOWN PRICES.

While it does not necessarily follow that because certain large interests are benefited temporarily, or possibly permanently, by the policy of forest reservation that the policy is necessarily wrong, it does emphasize the importance of so administering the reserves that the benefits which naturally and inevitably accrue to large timberland owners in the vicinity shall not be increased and emphasized by methods of administration. The reserves and their timber supply should, so far as practical, be utilized for the purpose of keeping down the prices which a private monopoly might be disposed to maintain.

LIEU-LAND LAW.

In the course of his remarks the gentleman from Washington made reference to the so-called forest reserve lieu-land law and called attention to the unfortunate character from a public standpoint of a large number of the transfers made under it, severely criticizing transactions which were highly beneficial to certain railway companies and other large owners of lands within forest reserves. The gentleman from Kansas in replying to some of these criticisms fell into the very curious error of criticizing the repealing act rather than the lieu-land law which the repealing act wiped from the statute books.

This is rather old straw, and it has been thrashed over to such an extent that it seems rather superfluous to discuss it further. I should not except for the fact that there are certain points involved in the discussion which I think should be cleared up in the interest of the accuracy of history.

I was not a Member of Congress at the time the sundry civil bill of June 4, 1897, which contained legislation relating to forest reserves, including the so-called lieu-land selection provision, was considered and enacted into law. I had been a Member of the former and became a Member of the succeeding Congress. A short time after the act was passed I became Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office and therefore had some knowledge of the view taken of the act in the Land Office and of its effect the first 18 months after it was placed on the statute books. The gentleman from Kansas has quoted Mr. Lacey, then chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, to the effect that the legislation was demanded by settlers who, finding themselves within the boundaries of forest reserves, desired to exchange their lands for lands outside the reserves in order that they might have the benefit of schools and other institutions, which they could not hope to have in a region where all further settlement was prohibited, there being at that time no provision for the agricultural entry of lands within the reserves.

SCOPE AND EFFECT OF LAW.

At that time Binger Hermann, of Oregon, was Commissioner of the General Land Office, and when the owners of lands within the reserves secured through railroad and other grants applied for the privileges of exchanging, he held that the privilege was not intended to apply to lands so acquired; but later Secretary Hitchcock held that the law did apply to all privately owned lands in forest reserves.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know whether or not the question was submitted to the Department of Justice or any one of its assistants?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know.

Mr. MURDOCK. Who was the Secretary at the time?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Hitchcock.

The effect of this decision was to give an immediate exchange value to all of the lands in private ownership within the exterior boundaries of the reserves, and that exchange value depended largely on the value which was then placed upon the timberlands which could be secured through exchange. It is true that some of the privately owned lands, railroad and otherwise, within the reserves were heavily timbered, and therefore there was no incentive for their exchange except as the timber upon them was cut.

SAN FRANCISCO MOUNTAINS FOREST RESERVES.

The effect of the legislation was early appreciated in the Land Office, and after the Secretary's decision considerable care was exercised in creating reserves to exclude as far as possible land-grant lands. It was with that object in view that, upon the recommendation of Commissioner Hermann, the San Francisco Mountains reserve when created resembled a checkerboard, at least that portion of it within the land-grant limits of the Santa Fe Railroad.

The administration and control of the reservation thus created proved to be difficult and vexatious, and with a view of consolidating the reserve and at the same time avoiding somewhat the granting to the owners of the railroad land the full right of exchange which they would have under the lieu-land statute, Secretary Hitchcock entered into an agreement the effect of which was to allow the exchange provided by the statute without restriction as to about two-thirds of the railroad land-grant lands and restricting the exchange of the other third to localities in which there were no valuable timberlands. It also allowed the owners of these lands to cut under Government regulation the timber from certain of the lands then under timber lease before making the exchange.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] said the other day that there was no contract, the inference being, I assumed, that there was no valid or binding agreement. It was as near a contract as the officers of the Government could well make it by agreeing to put the lands in reserve on the basis of an agreed plan of exchange. Secretary Ballinger, for some peculiar reason, in a communication which he addressed some years later to the Senate on the subject, said that there was no contract.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that that was the basis of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. The basis of my remarks was that communication which Mr. Ballinger made to Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. I could never understand how Secretary Ballinger came to use that expression, unless it was that he feared that there might be some criticism of his predecessor if the word "contract," which was actually not used, was used to designate the exchange that was agreed upon. But, at any rate, the agreement was made and the owners, the railroad companies and the Aztec Cattle Co. and other cattle and land companies which owned the land, began to make the exchanges.

By this time it became clear, as Commissioner Hermann had stated in his reports, that the lieu-land law was a mistake, and on November 24 I introduced House bill 24866, which read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act no public lands of the United States chiefly valuable for the timber they contain shall be subject to location or selection under the provisions of law providing for the location, selection, and patenting of lands in lieu of tracts covered by an unperfected bona fide claim or patent within a forest reserve, and any location or selection made or sought to be made on lands chiefly valuable for the timber they contain in lieu of lands within a forest reserve shall be void and of no effect.

I am of the opinion that it would have been better to have passed the law in that form rather than prohibit all exchanges, because there is no question but that it is well for the Government to have private lands not used or occupied by settlers, so far as possible, excluded from the reserves, where they are timber growing or timber producing, or where they are needed for the protection of watersheds.

When the bill was taken up for consideration in committee certain objections were made to it, one being that the measure, if passed in the form introduced, might prevent the completion of exchanges where lands had been surrendered and other lands selected. The officials of the Interior Department were of the opinion that exchanges under way would not be affected and would be, if found regular, perfected in any event. They did, however, express the opinion that the legislation would prevent the carrying out of the agreement which the Secretary had made relative to lands in the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve, and the legislation as reported, and as it passed the House, excepted the lands covered by this agreement from the provisions of the act and also contained a provision specifically providing that it should not affect cases where the applicants for exchange had done everything that the law and regulations demanded them to do, but where the cases had not been finally passed upon by the department.

My recollection is that this action was taken upon the insistence of those representing settlers and other small transferees, who feared that the act might jeopardize their interests in spite of the assurance of the Interior Department that it would not.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I would be glad to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to ask at this point whether any of this was railroad land that was afterwards exchanged when the transfer had not been completed?

Mr. MONDELL. There were all kinds of land in that condition. The gentleman will understand that the railroad companies themselves—that is my understanding of it, although I have never inquired into it carefully—the railroads themselves made comparatively few exchanges. The railroads generally, I think, sold their base lands, and other parties made the exchanges. It is true that a great many of these exchanges were for nontimbered public lands of comparatively little value. The lieu rights were used largely throughout the West by ranchmen and others for the purpose of taking up lands adjacent to their holdings. The farmers and stockmen took up 40 and 80 and 160 acre tracts here and there, and considerable of the land was absorbed in that way, although much of it was absorbed in taking valuable timberlands in the Northwest.

In a report made January 13, 1904 by the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Committee on Public Lands on H. R. 4866, concurred in by Secretary Hitchcock, the statement was made that there were over 3,500,000 acres within the primary limits of the land grants of the various railroads, wagon roads, and military roads subject to exchange in addition to an amount not possible to determine within indemnity limits. There were also large acreages of State school lands which were legitimate basis for exchange when in private ownership, and a large amount of these lands, possibly a half million acres, were in such ownership. After the legislation passed the House it went to the Senate, where it had many vicissitudes. Finally it came back from that body modified in this way, that instead of providing that there should be no exchanges for public timberlands it provided that there should be no exchanges at all. It did recognize the San Francisco Mountains agreement; and the amendment provided for by the conference report, to which the gentleman from Kansas referred, was the amendment which the Department held to be unnecessary, but which was adopted by the House—out of excess of caution, possibly—to provide that cases before the department which were regular should be completed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, do we understand that the amendment to which I alluded which was offered in conference and accepted was the same amendment as the gentleman had previously offered in the House?

Mr. MONDELL. I will not say that it was the same amendment in actual words. I could tell by referring to it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Virtually the same amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Virtually the same amendment. That is my recollection. I have not recently looked it up. I am stating it from memory, but I think it was in effect the same, though it did recognize rights down to the date of the passage of the act instead of the earlier date fixed by the House bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has spoken of the long delay in the Senate. What was the reason for that delay?

Mr. MONDELL. "The gentleman" is not acquainted with the doings of the Senate, and does not have official knowledge of the reason of the delay.

Mr. MURDOCK. As I recollect, the bill of the gentleman passed the House in April of one year and did not come back into the House from the Senate again until March of the next year, a matter of 11 months.

Mr. MONDELL. When the bill went to the Senate there was no action taken for some time, and then all of the House bill was stricken out and a composite proposition then pending before the Senate committee was substituted. It provided, among other things, for exchanges of like character and quality both as to soil and timber, but it related to a number of things. That was inserted in lieu of the House bill, and when that bill came before the Senate the Senate referred it back to the committee, and the committee then reported it out, striking out the House bill and inserting the bill prohibiting all exchanges. I am still of the opinion, as I was at the time, that it would have been better to pass the House bill, allowing exchanges so long as they did not take timbered lands.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not wish to anticipate the gentleman's speech, and if I am doing so it will be perfectly agreeable to me to wait until the gentleman reaches that point; but if not, I want to ask if it was during the time that this bill of which the gentleman speaks was pending in the Senate that the transaction took place about the 240,000 acres in Montana, where the Northern Pacific Railroad is alleged to have received 240,000 acres of practically treeless and practically worthless land included in a forest reserve that was exchanged for timbered lands?

Mr. MONDELL. My recollection is that while the legislation was pending there was a considerable addition to a forest reserve in southern Montana, and that there was a considerable amount of railroad land in the land so included, and that it did not contain timber of any considerable value, although a large part of it was mountainous, broken land, with some scrubby timber upon it. I think that was the last of the inclusions of railroad land before the repeal of the act. The act in amended form became a law March 3, 1905.

Had I been in Congress at the time the law was passed, I probably would have been impressed as were others with the necessity of allowing settlers to make exchanges, there being then a comparatively small amount of railroad and other grant lands in the reserves. When the necessity became apparent for the modification or repeal of the law, my thought in introducing the bill was to prevent any more valuable timber lands to be taken in exchange. Without regard to the merits of the agreement which the Secretary of the Interior had made relative to lands in the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve, the probability is that that agreement could have been enforced as a claim, and having been largely executed, its recognition was seemingly imperative. The repeal of the act as to other lands put an end to exchanges which would have aggregated three or four million acres, at least.

Some features of this matter illustrate how men with the best intentions in the world may become unwittingly parties to transactions not in the public interest. They illustrate the importance of being careful and conservative even in the advocacy of general propositions which, in the main, may be entirely praiseworthy. So anxious were some forest-reserve enthusiasts to extend the area of the forest reserves that they did not always scrutinize carefully the motives and interests of those who urged establishment and enlargement of reserves. Furthermore, many of those who were the most earnest advocates of a very wide extension of reserves believed that extensions should be made, even though in the consolidation of the reserve the Government did not, in the first instance, make a good trade. This is illustrated in a statement in a letter from Mr. Pinchot, then Forester in the Agricultural Department, to Commissioner Richards, of the General Land Office, under date of September 3, 1903, which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] placed in the RECORD of June 3.

Referring to certain exchanges for lands in a California forest reserve, he said:

> I am strongly of the opinion that even at the cost of a relatively poor bargain by the Government, which from the present situation I apprehend is not to be feared, it would be wise to make the exchanges.

While I do not entirely disagree with the view thus expressed, I am of the opinion that greater care should have been exercised by those responsible for recommending and urging the establishment and extension of reserves to see that lands recommended for inclusion did not include considerable areas of comparatively nontimbered lands in private ownership.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the gentleman believe, in order to be fair to himself and Mr. Pinchot and to those who may read the RECORD, that this sentence which precedes the sentence which the gentleman has read from Mr. Pinchot's letter should also go in the RECORD:

> I am informed that Mr. Washburn has agreed to take untimbered land in one of the Dakotas for his holdings back of Santa Barbara.

Mr. MONDELL. That is to be inferred from what I read. Mr. Pinchot said in his statement I read "that in the present situation" he did not apprehend poor bargains were to be feared, and still as a general proposition he took the view that exchanges should be made even though the bargain might be a poor one. I am inclined to think it was in the case he referred to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The one particular criticism that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], it seemed to me, urged the other day in regard to what I said was that I had asserted that these exchanges were made with the consent of the Forest Service. I think I am paying the gentleman a well-deserved compliment when I say that no man in the House is more familiar with these transactions than the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and I would like to ask him this question: Has the gentleman ever found anywhere where these exchanges—the San Francisco Mountain exchange and the Great Canyon exchange, or any exchange made with the Northern Pacific—where there was any opposition to that transfer which came from the Forest Service or from Mr. Pinchot?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, that is a pretty large contract which the gentleman from Washington places in my hand. As to many of these forest reserves, I know no more as to who recommended their establishment than does the gentleman from Washington. I know something about what happened while I was in the Land Office and from hearsay I know what happened with regard to some other reserves, but when you say the Forestry Service, of course you are using a very broad term. At the time this act passed and for several years thereafter there were two forestry services. One was the Forestry Service in the Agriculture Department and the other was the Forestry Service in the Interior Department, and while they were entirely separate and the two of them were in frequent clashes, still they were more or less in harmony, sometimes more and sometimes less, and the Forestry Service in the Agricultural Department was constantly making recommendations—men in the service and those interested in the subject—with regard to these reserves.

The gentleman need not confine his statement to the Forestry Service. He will remember that the board that arranged the establishment of the 15 reserves that were established the last year of Mr. Cleveland's administration was composed, I think with one or two exceptions, of men not connected with the Forestry Service either now, then, or at any time. They were all of them high-minded, patriotic gentlemen, honest to a fault. They recommended some very extraordinary territory to be put into forest reserves. They probably did more to harm the forestry-reserve policy for several years than all of the enemies of the policy put together, because their recommendations were made from palace-car windows, and they did not in every case include lands that ought to have been included, and they did in some cases include lands which ought not to have been included in the reserves; and that was so patent that Congress for a year suspended those reserves, and finally they became effective, only to have their boundaries largely changed later.

I can not do more than to reiterate what I have said, that I think many men, who I think are honest men, allowed their zeal to run away with their judgment in the matter of creating reserves, and without intending to do so they became unwittingly the aids of men who for improper purposes were trying to have reserves created, to wit, in order that they might have lieu-land rights; and it all illustrates this, that in human affairs it is often hard to draw a dividing line between what is absolutely correct and virtuous and what is harmful and ill advised. I should not be disposed to criticize any of those gentlemen at all at any time if it were not for the fact that some of them are tremendously prone to criticize other people for doing things which they think are entirely proper.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will be brief, because my time is running and I have not even started.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I will try and make my statement specific. My colleague from Washington, Mr. BRYAN, thought that I unduly criticized Mr. Pinchot. I certainly had no intention of doing so, and I therefore want to ask this specific question of the gentleman [Mr. MONDELL], who is perhaps more familiar with these records than anyone in the House: From the time of the creation of those forest reserves in Arizona until the law was passed repealing the lieu-land law, has the gentleman ever seen in the records anywhere any protest coming from Mr. Pinchot against any of those transfers or exchanges by the railroads of land in various reserves for land outside?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not recall I ever did, but still it does not follow there might not have been cases of that kind. Possibly Mr. Pinchot did not deem it his duty to oppose.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not arguing it was. I wanted to know the facts. That is what I am trying to ascertain in regard to these matters.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not pretend to be fully informed, but my recollection is as I have stated. I reiterate that in all of these matters I am always inclined to think that men in public life act from honest motives. I have seen very few exceptions—very few cases where public men did not act from proper motives in what they did.

THE FOREST-RESERVE POLICY.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] in the course of his very interesting remarks, to which I have referred, referring to the forest-reserve policy, gave Mr. Pinchot and ex-President Roosevelt exclusive credit for the establishment of that policy and stated that in it they had little or no sympathy from the leaders of the Republican Party. I have no disposition to take from either of these distinguished gentlemen any proper credit for any useful or helpful thing which they may have been instrumental in aiding or accomplishing. We are all free to recognize the useful, helpful, and patriotic services of the ex-President to the people in many lines. The ex-Forester advocated and accomplished some good things, and all these services were while the gentlemen were Republicans; they have had no opportunity for public work as officials since they left the party. But when the gentleman from Kansas gives these gentlemen credit for the establishment of the policy of national forest reserves he is not speaking accurately.

It may be interesting to briefly sketch the inauguration and the growth of the national forest reserves. In 1890 Commissioner Groff, of the General Land Office, serving under Secretary Noble and in the administration of Benjamin Harrison, suggested legislation reserving mountain timberlands, and reporting on a Senate bill in March of that year recommended that woodlands and timbered areas, which for climatic, economic, or public reasons required the protection and supervision of the Federal Government, should be reserved from disposition under the general land laws. In March, 1891, President Harrison signed the bill which provided, among other things, for the creation of forest reserves. Within a year 6 reserves were established, and before the close of President Harrison's administration 15 reserves were established, containing approximately 13,000,000 acres.

UNDER CLEVELAND AND M'KINLEY.

During the first three years of the succeeding administration of President Cleveland 3 reserves were established, containing 4,500,000 acres, and in the last year of his administration 15 new reserves, with an area of approximately 20,000,000 acres, were created. During President McKinley's first term 13 of the reserves last referred to, which had been temporarily suspended by act of Congress, became effective, and 12 new reserves were created. So that when the Agriculture Department, in February, 1905, was given supervision of the reserves they were 59 in number, containing nearly 63,000,000 acres. Some 22,000,000 acres, in addition, had been examined and were soon thereafter included in reserves, making 83 reserves with over 85,000,000 acres at the time the Agriculture Department, or the Forest Service in that department, succeeded to the management of the reserves.

TRANSFER OF RESERVES.

For some time before the transfer of the reserves there had been considerable friction between the Land Office, in control of reserves, and the Forestry Division under the Agriculture Department. It was thought at one time that this friction might be overcome by the transfer of the Forestry Bureau to the Interior Department. There were a number of obstacles and objections to such a transfer, and largely in the interest of harmony and in the hope of a more satisfactory administration of the reserves, I introduced the bill which became a law February 1, 1905, as I have stated, transferring the forest reserves to the Agriculture Department. Not only were many reserves covering a vast acreage thus transferred to the Forest Service in the Agriculture Department, but prior to that time practically all of the important legislation now in force affecting the management of the reserves, except the forest-reserve homestead law, had been placed upon the statute books. While the administration of the reserves in the Interior Department was not in all respects satisfactory, looking back upon it now the work of that department in forest protection and in many features of administration, carried on with an appropriation of from $100,000 to $300,000, seems under the circumstances to have been remarkably effective.

At one time and another since the reserves were transferred to the Agriculture Department I have severely criticized certain features of administration. I did that particularly at a time when it was very unpopular to do so; but I have never at any time favored or suggested the abandonment of the public control of large areas of forested land and lands protecting watersheds in the West. On the contrary, my criticisms have all been in the hope of calling attention to and remedying certain evils of reserve creation and administration. Certain of these evils were possibly temporarily inevitable.

The present management of the reserves has to a considerable extent removed a very definite ground of complaint by the elimination from reserves lands the reservation of which served no public purpose, but retarded settlement and development. I have never approved the elimination of heavily timbered lands from the reserves; on the contrary, I have frequently in years past criticized the failure to include certain of such lands in reserves.

THE SERVICE AT THIS TIME.

The service is also, so far as my personal observation goes, making an earnest effort, and with some considerable success, in removing causes of complaint as to acts and methods of administration. I am of the opinion, however, that there is plenty of room for improvement, particularly in the direction of active and effective sympathy and aid to those of small and limited means, farmers, miners, and others, who in one way or another seek to acquire rights upon or utilize the resources of the reserves as Congress has provided they may do. We need a fuller realization of the fact that the reserves are for use, and that it is the duty of officials to encourage rather than to discourage their proper use. I would suggest to all friends of a national forestry policy that that policy will be best served by urging and assisting in improvement of administration rather than by wholesale condemnation both of the arguments and the motives of those who may criticize.

STATE VERSUS NATIONAL CONTROL.

An effort has been made of late to stampede honest but uninformed friends of a national forestry policy into believing that there is a concerted and widespread movement, sinister in its purpose, on foot to transfer the reserves to State control, and this bogie man is constantly raised as the only answer made to criticisms of the service and its policies.

I do not pretend to be fully informed as to what the general public sentiment in all parts of the West may be in this regard, but I believe that there are comparatively few people who think it would be wise or practical at this time, or at any time in the appreciable future, to transfer the reserves to the States. For one thing, most of the States in which forest reserves are located are not in a financial position to assume and carry properly the burden of the reserves, and I think few of the people desire to assume the responsibility.

I do not object to those transfers on the ground that the people of the States are not to be trusted to honestly administer them. In my early days in the West the cowboys used to say of a particularly despicable fellow, "He is ornery enough to rob his own trunk." I have never thought the people of the sovereign States of the Union were subject to that kind of criticism. I do not think the people of the Western Commonwealths are going to rob their own trunks. I do not think they would squander their reserves; if they would, then self-government in the twentieth century is a failure, for if the people can not be depended upon to govern themselves under that Government where rests the greater part of their sovereignty, then there is not any hope for self-government anywhere. So I do not oppose transfers on the ground that people are going to squander their patrimony. I do oppose it on the ground the States can not afford it in many instances, and in other instances they have not and it would be difficult for them to speedily secure the machinery to operate the reserves. Further, as is pointed out by the Oregon conservation commission in a little pamphlet I got the other day, there are some questions connected with the reserves that are nation wide or at least interstate, and it would be rather difficult for the States to administer the reserves for that reason.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how long it will take me to conclude, but I would like to have permission to conclude my remarks. I think it will take me something over half an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. In so far as there may be a sentiment in favor of State control, the only way to effectively meet it is by careful consideration of all reasonable complaints and criticisms and by earnest effort to remedy faults that may exist. An improving service, which, whatever may be its faults, I believe the Forest Service to be, is likely to incline people to hope for further improvement under National rather than try the experiment of State control.

THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

I have taken up more time than I had intended in the discussion of forest reserves, for I desire to discuss at some length other matters pertaining to the public domain which fall within the all-embracing term "conservation."

As a matter of fact, while the forest reserves are of vast importance in their relation to the general welfare in many Western States, the reserves are of relatively less importance and interest to the people of those States than are the numerous problems and questions which relate to the acquisition, development, and use of the mineral and nonmineral public lands. In many regions of very great extent there are no forest reserves. The great majority of the people are seldom brought in direct contact with the problems which the forest reserves present. Most of them are never directly affected by the reserves or the methods of their administration. On the other hand, the problems of the acquisition, development, and utilization of the public lands is one that quite directly affects the great majority of the people of the regions in which the lands are located.

When one talks "conservation," therefore, in the public-land States they conjure up in the minds of their hearers all sorts of public-land problems, and it certainly is not the fault of the people out there that the mental picture "conservation" calls up is one of lands and resources locked up and numberless vexatious, exasperating, and well-nigh insurmountable obstacles placed in the way of the use and acquisition of such lands as remain unreserved.

I do not believe for a moment that any considerable number of those who favor whatever in their minds represents conservation desire a system under which the condition of the settler, farmer, stockman, miner, oil driller, and others seeking to develop lands and resources shall be one of extreme exasperation and difficulty. Possibly they find it hard to understand just how the preaching and practice of the most extreme form of conservation can seriously affect people claiming rights under law.

EFFECT OF CONSERVATION ON ADMINISTRATION.

The fact is that those charged with responsibility in the administration of the land laws have been so impressed with the extreme doctrines taught and extreme views expressed in the name of conservation that they have been consciously or otherwise affected in their whole attitude toward public-land questions. No department or bureau officer or clerk has ever lost his job or his reputation by construing the law against those desiring to secure rights on the public domain. On the other hand, the clerk or official who can discover some new or novel excuse for preventing the establishment of rights or titles is the envy of his fellows and marked for popularity and promotion.

Furthermore, it is natural and inevitable that among those whose permanent or temporary employment depends upon an extension rather than a curtailment of Government activity there should be some having a disposition, conscious or otherwise, to lengthen rather than shorten the scope of the activities in which they are engaged; and, finally, as perfectly ordinary, simple, and convincing cases pass along without any comment and only those less worthy or perfect or involving special questions of public policy attract special attention, a naturally suspicious disposition soon comes to assume that perhaps after all the best service is rendered by those who withhold rather than those who permit the enjoyment of rights the law confers. If in this state of mind among administrative officers and clerks you have what seems to amount to a public sentiment that rights on the public domain should be greatly curtailed and a like-minded influence of a less public character, one does not have to have a lively imagination to conjure up a condition under which claimants before the bureaus having to do with the public domain have a hard time in securing the rights and benefits the law was intended to grant them.

ALL FOR PROPER CONSERVATION.

All right-minded people believe in a proper conservation of all our resources, both on the public domain and elsewhere. We believe we are better conservationists who insist on justice under the laws and guarded and orderly development than those who really create monopoly and promote injustice by tying up resources and making the way of the settler, always a hard one, still harder.

At one time and another I have taken up with the Interior Department practically every cause for complaint by settlers on the public domain. I have made many speeches on the subject, some of which have been held by some people to indicate that I was not at all in harmony with what they were disposed to call "conservation." In December, 1911, I wrote a letter to President Taft, which I propose to put into the RECORD, if I may be allowed to do so, and which I feel I am justified in doing now, the gentleman having passed from public life, in which I called his attention to certain features of the administration of the land laws of which our people bitterly complained, and desired a betterment of them. I am frank to say that whoever might have been to blame, we did not get very much relief. I am frank to say that in the main, so far as relief through administration was concerned, things went from bad to worse. In the meantime, however, Congress has passed some liberalizing legislation affecting agricultural land and entries which has been very helpful.

Complaints with regard to the administration of the public land laws are of a vast variety, and I do not want you to lose sight of the fact that this constant agitation of some undefined thing known as conservation has been the most powerful of all the factors in bringing about a frame of mind in the department and among department officials under which it is entirely conservative to say that every statute is construed, so far as it can possibly be, in a way to make it difficult to secure the rights which it provides, and that, on the contrary, if there is any ambiguous language in the statute, or a hazy court decision anywhere, that can be found to make the perfection of rights and claims difficult, you can depend upon it that there is some ambitious person around in the department who will find it, and demand that it shall be made the rule in all cases. In these days he is a brave man, secretary or commissioner, who dares suggest to any clerk in his bureau that a certain construction of statutes is illiberal and shall not therefore be adhered to. They have in mind, no doubt, certain things that have occurred; how certain gentlemen have been criticized; have temporarily, at least, lost their reputation; how these questions have been made political in many cases. And, as I said, it is a brave man who, under these circumstances, dare do right.

CHARACTER OF COMPLAINTS.

These injustices are as numerous as the stars and as diversified as they are in magnitude, and one would need a week and not an hour to discuss them. It happens that many of the complaints come to me because of my believed familiarity with public-land questions and the fact that I have been on the Committee on Public Lands, and was for some time its chairman; perhaps by reason of the fact that I have been at times very emphatic in my statements in regard to these things. Referring again for the moment to forest reserves, I want to emphasize this, that never since I have served in this House have I had what ex-President Roosevelt used to call a "big man"—meaning a man of wealth and large influence—make complaint to me about a forest reserve or the Forest Service—not one. On the contrary, on one occasion when I criticized the service for putting an upset price on stumpage much above what stumpage had been considered worth in the locality, the man who had the contract was much provoked for my mentioning the fact. He said, "It was none of your affair; I was perfectly willing to pay that price, and you have gotten me into trouble." I would not care to say—because the gentleman perhaps exaggerated—what he claimed happened to him because I criticized the Forest Service for charging too much for stumpage. He said, "I can get a fair price for my lumber, because there is none other in the country, and I do not know any reason why you should dip in." I told him I dipped in because it was the interest of my constituents I was looking after; that his business enterprise did not interest me. The incident illustrates the fact that the trouble has been with the little fellows.

And so it is in the main with these public-land questions, and I presume that is true of the experience of every Member of Congress from the West. A railroad company, a great land company, if they have troubles with the department, have people they can afford to pay to look after them. The men we hear from are the small fellows, the men who find it difficult to pay an attorney or who find it impossible to employ one, and who appeal to their Congressman for aid.

UNWISE WITHDRAWALS.

Now, how do these difficulties arise? They began to multiply about the time the public lands of the country first began to be largely withdrawn. I am not going to discuss the propriety of those old withdrawals. I made a speech very severely criticizing the coal-land withdrawals of June, September, and October, 1906, and it is not necessary to go over that ground again. But that withdrawal was not necessary to accomplish what was sought to be accomplished.

As a matter of fact, after six months of pleading, we secured a modification of the order, which still left the order as effective as it was before, so far as the object sought was concerned, and that object was to prevent the acquisition of coal lands. But in the meantime thousands upon thousands of settlers had the statutory period run upon their entries, and had difficulties in making proof. Many of the people were unable to make entries or to go on with improvements. A thousand and one difficulties, some of which are still trailing their slow length through the departments, arose from that unwise action—unwise in the way in which it was done.

There was no authority at that time for withdrawals. Possibly there was a condition that justified the kind of a withdrawal which the modifying order left. The Republican Party, true to its adherence to a proper policy of conservation, put on the statute books a withdrawal act which made withdrawals legal. And under that act President Taft made a great many perfectly legal withdrawals—more than he should have made, in my opinion, in the interest of conservation.

POWER SITES.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] the other day in the course of his remarks criticized ex-Secretary Ballinger for having restored a lot of power sites. I do not know whether he restored any real power sites to entry or not. I know he did not in my State. He restored a lot of land to entry that the most enthusiastic conservationist, if he had been on the ground, would not consider power sites. For instance, at one time I began to get letters from people on the Big Horn River in my State—from homesteaders, Carey Act entrymen, desert entrymen, men who wanted to open a roadside stucco plant, and others—stating that the country was all tied up. I went to the department to find out what the trouble was.

I found that a tract of approximately 3 miles wide, about 1½ miles on each side of the river, for about 125 miles, zigzagging and following the sinuosities of the river, had been withdrawn. I asked a certain official how he came to do that. He said, "I would rather not discuss that matter with you." As a matter of fact, I am of the opinion he did not want to make that withdrawal—was instructed to. There was not anywhere within that 200,000 acres a tract of land that anybody, I imagine, ever can use for a power site, except at one point, and that was retained in reservation.

The probability is that that will never be utilized, but it is a possible point for power development. Otherwise the stream is a perfectly placid, slow-flowing stream, up there in a broad valley, which you could not under any circumstances utilize for the development of power. And now that it has been restored, no one has secured any power rights on it, or sought to secure any power rights on it, many a settler has completed his land entry on the banks of that river, and at one point some gas wells have been developed for the supply of two small towns. A railroad has come down there and gotten a right of way over a part of that land, a few miles of it, and the ordinary industries of the country have gone on.

That reservation was made just a few days before Mr. Garfield went out of office. It is hard for me to believe that he would have made that reservation if he had expected to remain in office. It is very, very hard for me to believe it. All I did was to make a map of it and place it on the Secretary's desk with the letters of the fellows who were affected, and say, "Please look at that," and walk away. A large part of the withdrawn land was covered with some sort of a claim that was unperfected.

So much for that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Unfortunately, I have been absent from the Chamber during a portion of the gentleman's address, which I otherwise would have been very happy to hear. I wanted to ask whether or not the gentleman had made any suggestions as to remedies by legislation, in the interest of the settlers?

Mr. MONDELL. I am coming to that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The reason I have made this inquiry is because, unfortunately for our committee, and I think unfortunately for the whole western country, the gentleman from Wyoming has severed his connection with the Public Lands Committee, for which we are all sorry; and I think I speak for the whole committee in saying that we would be glad to receive suggestions from him along the line on which we know he is so capable of enlightening us.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is very kind. I served for a long time and with a very great deal of pleasure on that committee, and gave a great deal of time to its work. The latter part of my service was at a time when this same feeling that I have discussed was running rampant, and it was pretty difficult for us to get anywhere, to accomplish anything really worth while, although we did greatly improve many of the land laws, and particularly the laws relating to agricultural settlement. Much progress was made in spite of adverse sentiment.

DECISIONS AFFECTING AGRICULTURAL LANDS.

Now, what are the difficulties before us to-day? First, a great variety of questions that I shall not stop to discuss at length relating to agricultural settlement. There have been a very considerable number of decisions curtailing and reducing the rights and privileges of settlers. Why, within the last 18 months we have had decisions that overturned the uniform practice of the Land Office for 40 years, and against which no one, as far as I know, ever uttered a note of protest. And more recently we have had other rulings which reduced to the minimum the benefits to the settler and magnified to the maximum the requirements placed upon his devoted head. The decisions under the desert-land law have been most trying, the delays under many classes of titles most vexatious.

I am somewhat hopeful of this new administration, and I serve notice now that I propose to give it credit for all it will do in the way of affording proper relief. I do not want to ask the administration to do too much, for fear somebody will say the administration has got in bad by following after these wicked anticonservationists.

In spite of the extreme so-called conservation sentiment which in many instances would withhold all rights to the public domain, Congress has liberalized the homestead laws very greatly in the last few years, and I want to emphasize this fact, that in doing it we have had no aid or comfort that I can recall, although we have not had serious opposition in every case, from the gentlemen who particularly pride themselves on being conservationists, either in the enlargement of the homestead area, in the reduction of the period of residence, or in the other improvements that have been made in the statute.

TIMBER AND STONE ACT.

We have heard much of the timber and stone act. No doubt it was the means of passing much valuable timberland into private ownership that should have remained in public control, but of late years there has been but little valuable timberland outside of reserves, and people have sought to utilize the law to secure lands containing scattering timber adjacent to their agricultural holdings. Some of the land sought has had very little value for timber or stone; in fact, for anything except grazing. When an application is made to purchase under the law the tract is inspected by an agent of the Land Office, and an almost universal complaint is that if the land has any considerable amount of timber it is appraised above its value. If it contains but little or no timber and is not of immediate value as a stone quarry the entry is denied, because it is not valuable for timber or stone. Under such an administration of the law not much land is sold, though the public interest would be served by selling such lands and putting them under taxation and private protection.

ISOLATED TRACTS.

I shall not trespass on your time to discuss the question of the sale of isolated tracts, as I shall put into the RECORD, along with other letters on public-land subjects, a letter I recently delivered to the Secretary of the Interior on this subject.

REPAYMENTS.

No feature of recent administration of the public-land laws reflects less credit on the Government than the rulings and decisions denying to those who have made payments for public lands the return of their money in cases where the claim or title to the land is denied. In these cases the Government retains both the land and the money the entryman offered in payment for it. As usual, this sort of bunko game is justified on the ground that it is in accordance with the intent of Congress. This retention of an entryman's money along with the land he sought to acquire is conservation with a vengeance.

MINERAL LANDS.

The mineral-land claimant is often a man of some means, able to hire a lawyer, and so a Member of Congress does not hear directly from his constituents so many complaints of administration as in the case of agricultural entries; but those cases he does hear and know of fully illustrate the refinement of the policy of exasperating delay, microscopic examination, and seeming reluctance to part with an acre of public lands which characterizes the mineral-land administration more, perhaps, than any other.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that in the three or four years that he and I served on the Public Lands Committee no one from the West ever sought to have that committee report out a bill granting the public lands of the West to the public-lands States? And is it not also a fact that the ultraconservationists have been trying most desperately through nearly all of that time to pass the bill at present known as the Lever bill, seeking to withdraw from entry all the public domain for the purpose of leasing it for long periods of time? And have not the American National Live Stock Growers' Association, of which Mr. Jastro is the head, and whose company own 150,000 head of cattle—have not that association, along with Mr. Pinchot and Mr. Gray and a few other distinguished gentlemen, been most ardent advocates of that bill, and have they not repeatedly been before our committee for that purpose?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman is a little extreme in his statement that the Lever bill would directly withdraw, or that it contains any provision directly withdrawing, land from entry.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I did not mean that.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is of opinion that the effect of it would be to largely discourage settlement, and that has been my opinion in regard to it. Some good people have thought that it was a good thing, and many men who own large herds of cattle think it is a good thing. It is true that many men who call themselves conservationists have favored the leasing of the public grazing lands, a measure which a great many people believe would be a fatal blow to settlement and development. There is ground for difference of opinion, we all realize. It is also true, as the gentleman from Colorado says, that no proposition for the transfer of the public lands to the States has been before the committee.

COAL LANDS.

Now, passing for a moment from that question, which the gentleman from Colorado and others will have to wrestle with, and I shall not until it comes on the floor of the House, although I may appear before the committee and make a few observations, let us go to the coal-land situation. We are now in another atmosphere. We have left the domain of the settler, with whom all of us sympathize, and we have gone into the domain of the coal baron. While all coal operators are not barons, as I have discovered at one time or another in my life, the trouble with the present coal policy is that the Federal Government has constituted itself and is in fact the greatest monopolist in the world, and following the example of other monopolists, it has out-Heroded all of the monopolist Herods that ever came down the pike. The Government, unlike other large landowners, does not need the money, is not paying interest or taxes, and therefore it puts a price on coal lands that would fairly stagger one.

I do not criticize the policy of coal-land classification and the sale of coal lands at a classified price. As a matter of fact, I discussed and favored it before it was adopted, although I do not want any credit for its adoption. For a time a reasonable policy was followed, and a price was placed on coal lands high enough to discourage purchase for speculative holdings and not so high but that a man could go into the coal-mining business in a large or a small way. It did not have the effect of absolutely preventing development, but there came classification and reclassification and reclassification until coal lands in some parts of the West are now classified as high as $500 an acre, and because in one place where a mine has been opened and the coal was at the end of opened entries they did sell a small tract for near that price, the argument is made that the price is not excessive. The price is so high that no one but a millionaire can open a coal mine or get coal land in the vicinity of transportation on the public domain. That coal runs all the way from the brown lignites of the Dakotas, running through all the grades to semianthracite, some of which is found in Colorado. In the main it is what the department calls "subbituminous." An illustration is the Pleasant Valley coal in Utah, the Rock Springs and Cumberland coals in Wyoming, and certain coals in Colorado and Montana. But there are other things about coal-land legislation. The gentleman from Kansas, the other day when upon this point, spoke of the Cunningham cases.

OPENED AND IMPROVED A MINE.

I probably know less about the Cunningham cases than most people except those who talk the most about them. I have read little of the evidence regarding them. I think the only thing I read carefully in connection with them was the letter of the Pinchot brothers to the President protesting against the patenting of the entries. While I am on that point I want to refer to a statement made by the gentleman from Kansas the other day, in which he was not entirely accurate, to the effect that the Land Office had at one time ordered the expedition of the cases with a view to issuance of the patents. I think that

Mr. Pinchot himself made that statement at one time, but afterwards corrected it as being inaccurate. The Land Office, as a matter of fact, when the controversy arose, was proceeding to investigate the entries, and they had been held up so far as patent was concerned.

But referring to the Alaska decisions, the other day I had a curious illustration of their effect. A coal miner—I do not know him, but I have letters from others who do know him and vouch for him as being a good, honest man, though I do not know that it is entirely necessary that a man shall have a certificate of character in order to take public land; but assuming that it is necessary, this gentleman, I am sure, can secure it. This miner made application, having saved a little money, for a preferential right to buy 40 acres of coal land. In pursuance of his rights he dug into the vein, squared it up, I think timbered it a little; at any rate got it into shape so he could take out and did take out some coal. He did not, it is true, open a mine and run a railroad in and spend a lot of money which he did not have. In fact, there was little market at that time. When he came to offer his money in payment for the land there was a protest against it, another party claiming the right to purchase because the entryman had not "opened and improved" a coal mine in accordance with the decision in the Alaskan cases. We have been disposing of coal lands for 25 years. Wherever a man found a piece of coal land and opened up the vein and found what it was and said he wanted to work it as soon as he could, and he wanted to pay for it, it was sold to him; but the law does say he shall have opened and improved a coal mine, and if you can construe that to mean a large developed mine, you see what the effect is on our friend the miner. The Land Office did not think that they ought to hold him too closely to the Alaskan decision, but the Secretary's office thought differently, and unless the new Secretary shall overturn the decision of the late Secretary that miner can not get that 40 acres of coal land; and he was proposing to pay a classified price for it, remember. It is not taking the lands of the public domain without giving something for them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for another interruption on that subject?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has this kind of a case been called to the gentleman's attention, where lands have been classified, say at $50 an acre, and then the man goes and opens up a coal mine and offers to buy it, and is notified he can have it at that figure; then he goes ahead and spends a large sum of money on it, and when he comes to prove up to have the department tilt the price up $200 an acre and tell him he can not have the land unless he pays the additional price after he has spent $3,000 or $4,000 in the development of the claim?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; but what do you expect of a department official with the air full of shouts of conservation, the air full of charges that Government officials have not gotten all out of the public lands in every case that should have been secured? Under these conditions the man had what he assumed to be a vested right. It would be a contract right if the Government were an individual, and before he has completed the contract and made the last payment, or perhaps after he has made payment—I think there have been such cases after payment has been made—some official of the Government comes along and guesses that the coal land ought to be worth more money than the original appraisement, and tilts the price double and sometimes treble what the man was to pay in the first instance. What is the official charged with responsibility to do? Is he to lay himself liable to some sensational charge that he is aiding and abetting the looting of the public domain; that he only received $2,000 for a tract of land that somebody in the Government service had guessed was worth $5,000? His job is secure, and no man outside of those who hate injustice will criticize him if he takes the safe course and says, "Well, I guess you will have to pay the increased price." Yes; I think there have been cases such as the gentleman from Colorado refers to, and they have not, to say the least, reflected credit on the Government.

If a public official has the courage to say that a contract is a contract and that it makes anarchists for a government to go back on its contracts, he is liable to be criticized; he is liable to be condemned as an enemy of the public. That has been the trouble. I have not blamed some of these men so much when I have realized the conditions which surrounded them. I hope we are reaching a day when it shall not be a cause for criticism if a man deals fairly by those who do business with the Government, and that it shall not be a cause for promotion because a man discovers some peculiarly ingenious way or scheme whereby a law may be tortured into making the way of him who does business with the Government relating to the public lands more difficult.

PHOSPHATE.

We have heard of phosphate withdrawals. We heard the cry a few years ago of how the country was going to the demnition bowwows because the phosphate lands were not withdrawn. A very good gentleman from Wisconsin made a speech down here before a conservation congress, and before that night one or two or three million acres were withdrawn out in Utah and Wyoming. Phosphate lands, as a matter of fact, need withdrawal for the protection of the public just about as much as limestone does. But I am not criticizing the withdrawal of known phosphate deposits, even if done in the interest of the distant future. There is no demand for the western phosphate now at all. Where they have been withdrawn they are practically valueless so far as any present market for phosphate is concerned. I have no disposition to criticize the withdrawal of a reasonable area, large areas, all of them, for that matter, that are actually known and are, in fact, valuable for phosphate; but, Lord, when you come to take in millions of acres, including the irrigable and irrigated valleys, preventing the perfecting of entries and preventing their being entered, on the ground that from one to five thousand feet beneath the fertile soil there may be some phosphate, it does not appear reasonable, to put it mildly.

In some instances, when you ask why lands are withdrawn in blocks of 100,000, 200,000, or 300,000 acres, you are told it is because in examining geological atlases of years ago they have discovered that in that territory there is a limestone which, some 25 years later, at a distance of some 400 miles on the other side of the Continental Divide, they found contained some phosphates. That is not overdrawing it at all. That is the statement. Is it any wonder that real conservation loses friends when things like that are done in the name of conservation?

A lot of these withdrawals are immaterial in a practical way. Nobody desires to utilize the lands except as the herdsman grazes over them, but many of them are lands to which men want to acquire agricultural rights upon, valley lands, which have been withdrawn because over on the other side of the Continental Divide they recently found phosphate in a limestone of the same character that the Geological Survey maps of 25 years ago proved existed there. There is no phosphate, so far as anyone knows, but possibly it is underlaid by the same old limestone that perhaps contains limestone several hundred miles away.

LIMITED TITLES.

We made appropriations to have those lands classified; few are restored or examined for restoration. It is suggested that we could cure the whole thing by providing for limited entries reserving the phosphate. Well, I have no objection; in fact, I favor legislation that will allow the agricultural ownership of lands known to contain mineral, excepting the mineral from the grant to the farmer. I introduced the bill which became a law for limited patents under agricultural entries of coal lands. To apply that principle generally and everywhere is not pleasing to the American farmer; it is not pleasing to American citizens of any sort or kind anywhere. They want their titles in fee, and while some may not think that is important—to please the American people in the character of their titles—I think that a man taking land that has no reasonable indication of containing mineral, where it is a thousand-to-one shot if it does contain mineral, it is not fair and just that he be compelled to take a limited patent.

As a matter of fact, if mineral is finally discovered on such land, I do not know of anyone that it is more in the public interest to have own it than the farmer who owns the soil. I do not know of any better condition than such as they have in Illinois, where the farmer owns the coal under his land. We are not to have that condition out West in the future. I introduced the bill that separates the coal from the balance of the estate where coal is known or believed to exist. As to land giving no sign of mineral character, if the land is held in small tracts I think the public welfare is best conserved by having the ownership in fee in practically all cases, even in the few cases where mineral may some day be found.

I shall not refer further at length to water-site withdrawals, for I referred to those a short time ago; but it is true that there still remains withdrawn as water-power sites many lands that never, under any circumstances, could be utilized for the development of water power. We need restorations and we need legislation for the use of these lands. I have introduced a bill which I believe is along the right lines.

ONE KIND OF POWER SITE.

I have been having some considerable correspondence with some settlers who desire to make homestead entry in the valley of one of the larger streams of my State. These lands were formerly located, but conditions were at the time adverse, and the people gave them up. Since then the land has been withdrawn as a power site. Making inquiries in regard to the matter, I am told that it is in the realm of possibilities that some day these lands may be submerged should anyone seek to build a dam at a point 4 or 5 miles lower down. There is no prospect that anyone ever will. If it is feared that power might be developed by such a dam, to the great damage of the public, that can be prevented by the simple process of holding the dam site in withdrawal. What is done, however, is to prevent the only settlement possible in the region on the theory that some distant day somebody might want to build a dam and submerge these lands. The fact that in such an improbable case, under our Wyoming law, the lands could be legally condemned does not seem to have occurred to those responsible for the withdrawal. Some day a dam may be built at the Great Falls of the Potomac, above this city. Would it have been wise to prevent, from the beginning of settlement hereabouts, the use of these lands? Here there may be some question of the right to condemn; out West there is none.

The House has already been more than kind and patient with me, and while I should like to discuss a lot of these other questions at length I shall not do so now, but shall close with a few suggestions as to what may be done to better conditions. First of all, we want a better administration; we want a fairer administration. Of all of the things that are indefensible in public administration, the worst is the attitude of an administrative officer that because a law is not as he thinks it ought to be he will make it practically inoperative in order to compel a change.

OIL LANDS.

That is the difficulty with the oil-land situation in my State and surrounding States. Oil land may be taken under the placer acts; at least that is the law. It is said that it is not a satisfactory law. Possibly it is not in all respects in all localities. And yet, taking everything into consideration, under all the conditions, it works fairly well. They say a man can take too much land. It is the same old law under which men worked out placer deposits in narrow gulches, and if a man could acquire all creation under it they would have done it in those cases.

Congress has not seen fit to change the law. In the meantime there may be localities where the law is not working well, where it is very patent that it is not, where its tendency is to create a monopoly. If there is any such place—I do not know—but if there be, then there no doubt is a justification for the withdrawals.

But this is the situation in my State, so far as oil lands are concerned: We are away off yonder, so far from all large centers of population that our oil deposits—deposits which we believe to exist, of which we have indications—have not been sought as have been the deposits of the surrounding States nearer the centers of population until quite recently, although we began the development of oil 25 years ago. In quite a number of places much money was expended years ago with comparatively little returns. But for the last three years people have been looking in our direction—not the Standard Oil; the Standard Oil does not drill wells. It leaves that kind of hazardous business to venturesome souls who engage in it in early youth and continue on to the grave. They have been seeking these fields. They have been locating lands. They have been leasing from people who have located. One would think the Government would encourage that sort of thing, there being a law providing for it, but, no, the agents of the Government haunt the water tanks, the sidetracks, and roost on the wayside fences, watching an oil derrick as it comes into the country and withdraw the lands around it the minute they find where the heroic and venturesome souls propose to spend their money.

Men do find oil even under such circumstances. It is oftentimes a hundred-to-one shot so far as the first location is concerned; but fail or win, they have no adjacent territory that they can develop; it is withdrawn.

VILLAGE GAS SUPPLY.

Fifteen years ago a man attempted to find some gas near a small village in the center of our State, at that time 200 miles from a railroad. Two hundred miles over the mountains into that arid valley he carried his drill and set it up on a piece of shale absolutely and utterly worthless and valueless unless it did contain something down below, and most of it did not. He finally, after much drilling, found some gas, but he could not with his limited means utilize it. It was 10 miles from a town of 1,500 people, and 2 miles from a town of 300 people. He could not even supply the nearby town, much less the other.

It took three or four years and a number of transfers to finally pass that oil land and some surrounding land into the hands of people who had money enough and courage enough to go on with the work. They finally got more gas. They piped the gas into the town 10 miles away, and into the town a mile and a half away, spent an enormous amount of money and displayed extraordinary courage and energy and enterprise. They patented several quarter sections of land, but on all the patented lands they could not get gas enough even for the small towns they had to supply. The wells proved to be inadequate. They have, however, one or two claims, including the claim on which gas was first found, to which they have been trying to get a patent for years, and they do not care to drill any more there until they do get a patent. They have had three separate and distinct investigations by agents of the department sent 300 or 400 miles to make them, and they do not know now whether they are going to get their patent. Somebody somewhere has heard of a decision which may raise the question as to how that company was organized away back yonder when it put its money into that enterprise; and if there is any way in which a statute or a decision can be distorted and tortured to prevent the men who have put their money into it from getting their title, I have no doubt but what some one connected with the Government will attempt to have it done.

SALT CREEK FIELD.

In the central part of Wyoming we have a field where some oil was found 25 years ago; lubricating oil, and not much of it. Finally some people went in five or six years ago 65 miles from the railroad out on an arid, salt, sage flat and put down some wells at great cost and found some good oil and piped it out 65 miles to the railroad. Immediately all the surrounding land was withdrawn, including much that had been claimed, drilled, and prospected for years, and that enterprise which might grow and prosper and develop is held back. It can not increase. The price of oil is going up, but you can not develop any in Wyoming, because the land is withdrawn.

A law is on the statute books which says that a man can secure title to oil land by doing certain things involving large expenditure and paying the Government for the land. There is a withdrawal act which says that for certain purposes land can be withdrawn; but it does not provide that the President shall have the power to say that land acts of Congress shall be null and void. That is what these withdrawals amount to.

If there was any probability or possibility of monopoly, there would be some justification, but there is not. Nobody claims there is.

MOORCROFT FIELD.

The other day I received a petition from some people in the northeastern part of my State, where 30 years ago an old fellow pulled in over the mountains a spring-pole outfit and the rope and chains necessary and put down a well and got a little oil. They have been trying for 25 years to get oil in paying quantities, but have not succeeded. Recently further and careful investigation has developed the location where oil in paying quantities can probably be found, and capital was found which was willing to go in and make the expenditure. There is not another oil development in 100 miles; but when they got the drills there and started to work, or got ready to work, the land was withdrawn, and the drills stand on the sidetrack and the communities stand still. There is no development. Some people may think it is lovely to live in a country where you can get public lands. Under such conditions a man would thank God if he could live in a country where lands were privately owned in order that he might go on with enterprises.

NO OIL MONOPOLY.

Nobody, so far as I know, is proposing any oil monopoly or wanting one. Even though this extreme conservation sentiment must be placated, there ought to be some way whereby at least some territory can be developed. Of course they say, "pass a leasing law." It does not occur to me as being quite the proper thing under a republican form of government for administrative officers to say to a Congress: "We will repeal your laws, and we will prevent development until you pass the kind of laws we want." What if they did not fancy such a law as Congress might enact. Would it in turn be nullified by withdrawal.

REMEDIES.

What are we going to do with regard to the matter? First we ought to continue in an evolutionary way still further to extend the farming homestead and the grazing homestead in regions where land can not be generally cultivated.

We ought to have some legislation under which purely grazing lands, nonmineral, valuable for no other purpose than grazing, can be purchased or leased—purchased preferably—so that farmers and stockmen can round out their holdings and have some fenced pasture. They can not fence the public domain, because it is against the law and a violation of the statute which would be liable to land them in the penitentiary.

We need coal-land legislation, and because we need it is no reason why the present policy should be followed. We will have to have oil-land legislation, because the placer acts do not fit all conditions; but because there should be some legislation along this line is no reason why the law now on the statute book, where it tends to orderly independent development, should not be allowed to operate.

We may have to do something with phosphate. I think we ought, out of abundant caution if for no other reason, to retain a large amount in public ownership. There is no reason why vast areas that some one guesses may have phosphate under them 1,000 feet below the surface should be withheld and the settler prevented from securing his title.

There is a demand that new legislation as it affects nonmetalliferous mineral land should be of a leasing character. There is not very much encouragement to bring in leasing legislation when conditions are as they were when the Alaskan coal-land leasing bill was before the House. I was not fully persuaded that a Federal leasing policy was the wisest one when I was the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, and yet I felt that there was such a demand for a trial of that policy that it was my duty to present a proposition of that kind to the House. Furthermore, it was suggested to me by a number of the leaders on our side, among others the present floor leader of the Republican Party, that it was our duty to attempt to solve that problem.

The Committee on the Public Lands brought in a bill providing for the leasing of coal lands in Alaska. In my opinion it is the best bill—and I do not say it because I drafted the original bill—the best bill that has ever been presented on the subject, and if we finally legislate on the leasing of coal lands in Alaska my opinion is that we will pass just such a bill.

It protects the public interests, it makes it possible, in my opinion, to carry on the work of developing the resources of Alaska. It came before the House on February 23, 1911. Those who believe in conservation—no; I mean those who make a fetish of conservation—opposed it and criticized it. There were some unfortunate occurrences in connection with the consideration of it, but the only reason why the coal-land situation in Alaska is not settled, and has not been settled since February, 1911, provided an equitable leasing law will settle it, is because the extreme conservationists would not have it. At that time there was much of politics in conservation, so called.

For information I shall place the Alaska coal-land leasing bill I have referred to in the RECORD. It is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 32080) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands in the District of Alaska containing workable deposits of coal are hereby reserved from all forms of entry, appropriation, and disposal, except under the provisions of this act: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall in any manner affect any claims or rights to any such coal lands heretofore asserted or established under the land laws of the United States, and all such claims and rights shall be treated, passed upon, and disposed of as though this act had not been passed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, for and on behalf of the United States, to issue licenses granting the holders thereof the right to prospect and explore for coal on the vacant public lands in the District of Alaska and to execute leases authorizing the lessee to mine and remove coal from such lands. No license shall pertain to an area of more than 3,200 acres, and no lease shall pertain to an area of more than 2,560 acres, and all such areas shall be in reasonably compact form and conform to the public-land surveys in all cases in which said surveys have been extended over the lands. No prospecting permit shall be issued for a longer period than three years. All licensees shall pay in advance a fee of 25 cents per acre for the first year covered by their license, 50 cents per acre for the second year, and $1 per acre for the third year. Lessees shall pay in advance a rental of 25 cents per acre for the first calendar year, or fraction thereof, 50 cents per acre for the second year, and not less than $1 and not more than $4 per acre for each succeeding year. The sums paid for rent by a lessee shall in every case be a credit upon the royalties that may be due for the same year. All lessees shall pay a royalty on each ton of 2,000 pounds of coal mined, as follows: From the passage of this act until the end of the calendar year 1920, not less than 3 cents nor more than 6 cents per ton; for the succeeding 10 years, not less than 5 cents nor more than 8 cents per ton; for the succeeding 10 years, not less than 5 cents nor more than 10 cents per ton; and thereafter as Congress may provide. All leases shall be granted for such period as the lessee shall designate, but in no event for more than 30 years; but all lessees who have complied with the terms of their leases shall have a preferential right to an extension of their lease for a period not to exceed 20 years upon such conditions and the payment of such rents and royalties as Congress may prescribe.

SEC. 3. That any person over the age of 21 years who is a citizen of the United States, or any association or corporation composed of such persons, may apply for a permit to prospect for, or a lease to mine, coal in the District of Alaska, and upon compliance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder shall be granted a license or lease as provided herein, but no person, association, or corporation, or stockholder therein shall, during the lifetime of such permit or lease, receive or be permitted to hold, directly or indirectly, any other permit, lease, or license, or any interest therein, to coal lands in Alaska under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That applications for prospecting licenses and mining leases, and all payments on same, shall be made to such officer and in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may designate, and in all cases where more than one application shall be received for a license or lease covering the same area, in whole or in part, preference shall be given to the qualified applicant who shall show prior possession with a view of acquiring title to coal lands or prospecting for or mining coal, and reasonable diligence in applying for such license or lease, but the holder of a prospecting license shall have a preference right, during the period of his license, to apply for and obtain a mining lease to the lands covered by his license: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may adjust the boundaries of conflicting applications in such manner as will best promote the public interest.

SEC. 5. That all applications for licenses or leases shall describe the lands applied for according to the public-land surveys or private surveys which may have been approved by the United States surveyor general, or if on unsurveyed land by description by metes and bounds and reference to natural objects or permanent monuments as will readily identify the same. No license or lease shall be issued until after publication of the application therefor at least 30 days in some newspaper of general circulation in the land district in which the land is located and an opportunity has been given for the hearing of any protests which may be made during the period of publication against the issuance of such license or lease, and no lease covering unsurveyed land shall be issued until a survey shall have been executed, at the expense of the lessee, by or under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, permanently marking the out-boundaries thereof and subdividing the same according to the rectangular system of surveys. Licenses may be canceled by the Secretary of the Interior after reasonable notice for failure to pay rent when due.

SEC. 6. That all leases issued under the provisions of this act shall be upon the condition that the lessee shall proceed with due diligence to open a coal mine or mines on the leased premises and to produce coal therefrom during the life of the lease in such quantity as the condition of the market shall justify. That the lessee shall not during the lifetime of the lease receive or hold, directly or indirectly, any other lease under the provisions of this act or interest therein. That he shall not monopolize, in whole or in part, the trade in coal. That he will at all times sell the coal extracted from the leased premises at just, fair, and reasonable rates, without the giving of rebates or drawbacks, and without discrimination in price or otherwise, as between persons or places for a like product delivered under similar terms and conditions. That the mining operations shall be carried on in a workmanlike manner with due regard to the permanence of the mine, without undue waste, and with especial reference to the safety and welfare of the miners. That the leased premises and all mines opened thereon and all maps and records of coal production shall at all times be subject to inspection and examination by such officers as may be provided by law or designated by the Secretary of the Interior for such purpose. That the lessee shall observe, abide by, and conform to all of the provisions and limitations of this act, and that he shall pay promptly all rents and royalties when due; and the Secretary of the Interior or any person in interest may institute in the United States district court for division No. 1, District of Alaska, appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of the terms of the lease or for its cancellation for violation of the terms thereof or of the provisions of this act. Appeals from the decisions of the said court shall lie to the United States circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit. Said leases shall also be upon the condition that the United States shall, at all times, have a preference right to take, wherever found, so much of the product of any mine or mines, opened upon the leased land, as may be necessary for the use of the Army or Navy or Revenue-Cutter Service, and pay such reasonable and remunerative price therefor as may be fixed by the President, but the owner of any coal so taken who may be dissatisfied with the price thus fixed shall have the right to prosecute suits against the United States in the United States district court for division No. 1, District of Alaska, for the recovery of any additional sum or sums claimed to be justly due upon the coal so taken.

SEC. 7. That no lease shall be granted or issued until the applicant shall have given a bond to the United States in such sum and with such surety as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for the payment of the rents and royalties and for the due and faithful compliance with all the terms and conditions of the lease. The existence of such bond shall be no bar to the institution of a suit for the enforcement of the terms of the lease or for its cancellation for the violation of the terms thereof or the provisions of this act, and a judgment of forfeiture of the lease shall be no bar to the enforcement by legal proceedings of the bond given in behalf of the lease.

SEC. 8. That no license or lease shall be assigned, mortgaged or sublet, except to a person, association, or corporation qualified to receive and hold an original license or lease under the provisions of this act, and with the written permission and approval of the Secretary of the Interior; and whosoever succeeds to the interest of the licensee or lessee by foreclosure, purchase, or assignment shall be subject to all the limitations and obligations contained in the license or lease or in this act.

SEC. 9. That a license or lease may be terminated at any time on the application of the licensee or lessee and the payment of all rents and royalties which may be due, but no lease shall be terminated until the Secretary of the Interior shall have had an opportunity to have an examination made into the condition of the property and such reasonable provision shall have been made for the preservation of any mine or mines which may have been opened on same, as he may require. Upon the cancellation of the lease or its expiration, or upon the forfeiture thereof and the satisfaction of any judgment rendered in the decree of forfeiture and the payment of all rents and royalties due, the retiring lessee may, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, remove or dispose of all of the machinery, buildings, or structures upon the leased premises, except such structures as may be necessary for the preservation of the mines.

SEC. 10. That no prospecting license issued under the provisions of this act shall give the licensee the exclusive use of any of the lands covered by his license, except for the purpose of prospecting and exploring the same, but all lessees under the provisions of this act shall enjoy the exclusive use of the surface, providing that this exclusive use shall in no wise interfere with the establishment and use of all necessary roads and highways, so located as not to interfere with the mining operations, and the granting by the Secretary of the Interior of such rights of way across such lands as may be necessary for use in the production, handling, or transportation of coal or other products of the District of Alaska.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue limited mining leases to applicants qualified under section 3 of this act, and to municipal corporations, a tract not exceeding 160 acres in extent, and covering a period not exceeding 10 years, for the mining of coal for use in the District of Alaska. Such limited leases shall, in addition to the above limitations, be subject to all of the conditions of the general leases issued under the provisions of this act, except that a renewal of such lease shall be discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior and that the acquisition or holding of such limited lease shall be no bar to the acquisition or holding of a general lease provided for in this act, nor shall the holding of a general lease be a bar to the acquisition or holding of a limited lease.

SEC. 12. That 75 per cent of all the moneys derived from licenses and leases granted under the provisions of this act shall be paid into and constitute a part of the "Alaska fund" in the Treasury of the United States, provided for and created by the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction and maintenance of roads, the establishment and maintenance of schools, and the care and support of insane persons in the District of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved January 27, 1905, and may be expended for the purposes described in said act; and the residue of the moneys derived from such licenses and leases shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and constitute a part of the general fund of the Treasury.

SEC. 13. That the reservation contained in section 1 of this act shall not prevent the location and patenting of lands containing workable deposits of coal under the mining laws of the United States with a view of extracting metalliferous minerals therefrom. But licenses and leases provided for in this act may be issued without regard to the fact that the lands may be covered by mining locations, and the Secretary of the Interior shall provide by appropriate regulation for the observance by licensees, lessees, and locators of the respective rights of each: Provided, That all patents issued under the mineral laws to such lands shall reserve to the United States all the coal contained therein, together with the right to provide for the prospecting for and mining of the same.

SEC. 14. That the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and all acts amendatory thereof, are hereby extended to and made applicable to the District of Alaska in so far as the transportation of coal is concerned; and for the purpose of administering said acts in Alaska with regard to the transportation of coal, the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the Commerce Court is hereby extended to the District of Alaska. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make all necessary rules and regulations in harmony with the provisions of this act needful and necessary for the administration of the same.

LEASING LEGISLATION.

We shall probably to a certain extent adopt the policy of leasing. I do not look upon it as being wise and satisfactory beyond all question, and yet I would be very happy indeed if it were possible to provide that all the remaining coal, oil, gas, and phosphate lands in the West should remain in public ownership leased by the States. I shall probably be labeled as an anti-conservationist for declaring in favor of the State doing this work. It is a curious thing; I have never been able to understand it, but the same people who call themselves conservationists with a big "Con," with a capital "C," are the same people, or many of them, who on all occasions insist upon their complete confidence in the people. The people, in their opinion, are to be trusted always. I believe that. The final judgment of the people is the voice of God in matters of government as near as we get it. The final judgment of the people under our form of government is best secured in the State where the major portion of the sovereignty of the people resides. In this, the forum of the Nation, we stand with shortened and limited authority, but back yonder in the States the people are clothed in all the authority of sovereignty. Everything of sovereignty, save the limited power delegated to the Nation, rests and resides with the people in the States. If the people in the States can not be trusted, what foundation is there for the faith so loudly proclaimed by gentlemen who make a fetish of conservation, at the same time proclaiming their loyalty to the people?

STATE CONTROL.

There are many reasons why it would be a wise policy for the State to retain and lease mineral lands. The State has complete police power and jurisdiction, and there would rise none of those questions of conflict between the national jurisdiction and the State police jurisdiction which a national leasing system would raise. I do not know just what would happen in the case of a coal-mine strike if we had a lease law under Federal control. I think there would be quite a question there, and possibly not a fortunate or satisfactory one; but with the mine completely under the control of the people in the State that question could not arise.

Whether it is wise that the Federal police power shall be extended or not is another question, but that the problem would arise under Federal leases there can be no question at all. Further than that, the States now supervise the mines. They must under our form of government. They would continue to do so. The States are entitled to the revenue, not but that I think the States would get it under a Federal-lease law. I think there would be enough influence that Congress would probably pass over to the States a little more than the Federal Government would ever get clear out of the mines, just as we now do in one way or another in the matter of the forest reserves.

The probability is, however, that legislation for State leasing of public lands and resources could not be accomplished at this time, and therefore if we are to try the experiment of leasing it will have to be, in all probability in the first instance, the experiment of Federal leasing. I am hopeful that the problem can be worked out in some satisfactory way. I want to make just this suggestion: Those who desire to aid in the solution of these problems should remember that the easiest way and the surest way to defeat the settlement of the problems in a fair and workable way is to be extreme in their demands one way or the other. That is the rock on which we have split in the past. That has been largely the difficulty. I do not charge anyone who has honestly conjured with the name of "conservation" with any intent to prolong the agony and extend the time of complete solution, but I do know that, intentionally or not, the extreme view and theory of conservation has made it more difficult than it otherwise would have been to solve these problems in a way that anyone believing in conservation through use would consider satisfactory.

Mr. BRYAN rose.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. Before the gentleman takes his seat will he be kind enough to state whether his position is friendly or unfriendly to the proposed investigation as suggested by the pending resolution offered by my colleague?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I have not thought very much about it. I do not imagine the Forest Service itself would object to it. It has been very fashionable of late to investigate everybody, and if anybody desires it I do not know why anyone would object to having it passed along to the Forest Service. I will say, however, to the gentleman that I have never myself been very much given to investigations. I prefer constructive work. I have been on several investigating committees, but I have not the spirit of the sleuth and detective to a sufficient degree to make that sort of thing particularly alluring to me. I certainly shall not stay awake nights either to urge or prevent it.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman think a sleuth or detective would undertake that investigation?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not know. There are people who honestly believe it would be an excellent thing for the service. I have not any doubt but what the gentleman's colleague does think that it would be for the good of the service. It may be. I do not pretend to be informed, and I am not passing on that proposition.

It is for that side of the House to decide as to investigations, and if they decide on this one, of course we will have to participate in it as a minority, and I suggest that perhaps the gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, and the gentleman from Washington, Mr. BRYAN, could appropriately be on the committee as representing the same view of this highly important subject. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Under leave to extend his remarks, Mr. MONDELL presented for printing in the RECORD a letter he wrote President Taft on December 11, 1911, in regard to certain features of administration of the land laws.

The letter is as follows:

DECEMBER 6, 1911.

The PRESIDENT,
White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On the occasion of your recent trip through northern Wyoming I imposed upon your patience to the extent of referring briefly to some features of the present administration of our land laws which a large majority of our people who are affected by and acquainted with the same believe give them just ground for complaint.

There is in my State a widespread opinion touching our land administration to the effect that the agencies provided by law for the purpose of aiding in the disposition of the public lands in accordance with the letter and spirit of the statutes have, in a considerable measure, been converted into instrumentalities whose primary object and purpose seems to be to make it as difficult as possible for the citizens to avail themselves of the opportunities afforded by the land laws and to discourage the acquisition of public lands.

I desire to emphasize the fact that this regrettable condition of public opinion is widespread and exists to a very great extent throughout the Intermountain States, and as one who has had wide opportunities to become familiar with conditions in the field and in the department, I regret to say that in my opinion there is much of foundation for it.

It is, I think, generally believed, and with reason, that in relation to some classes of cases the Secretary's office has to some extent corrected practices and decisions of the Land Office, of which bitter complaint has been made, but in the meantime entrymen have had their entries suspended for months and years and have been compelled to incur heavy expense in attending hearings and perfecting appeals. If it is not a fact that every doubt and technicality is resolved and construed against the entryman in the General Land Office, that office certainly has a great grievance against public opinion in the public land States.

In a letter of this kind it is manifestly impracticable to go into details in regard to the vast variety of policies and practices that have been complained of; they mostly have their root in the view I have referred to, that the first and primary purpose of the Land Department is to make the acquisition of public land difficult, and incidently furnish employment to a large number of people. I feel, however, that I owe it to you to refer in some detail to certain classes of cases.

HOMESTEAD.

Much has been said by the extreme advocates of permanent government ownership of lands, relative to restrictive laws with relation to the disposal of mineral and timber lands, but these people have not cared to undertake the unpopular task of crying down the homesteader. Our land administration, however, has steadily increased his burdens and curtailed his privileges.

Some time since the conditions surrounding the commutation of homestead entries were made very trying, but I and those who hold the views I do made no special complaint of this—except as made retroactive—as we believe it tends to promote permanent settlement, which we desire. Still the fact must not be lost sight of that this action constituted the denial of privileges which had been enjoyed from the passage of the homestead law.

Quite recently, however, a decision has been promulgated from the Secretary's office which reverses the rule of constructive residence on five-year homesteads, and as such are the only class allowed under recent legislation the decision affects nearly all homesteaders. From the beginning of the homestead policy it was realized that after the homesteader had left his former home, traveled far, and selected his new one, some time would inevitably elapse during which he would be winding up his affairs at the old home and preparing the new one for his family, during which time a strict compliance with the law as to residence could not be expected. In order to meet the conditions of this period of transit a rule that for the first six months after filing the entryman would be held as being constructively on the land was adopted, and has been followed ever since. Up to the time the opposite rule was adopted and applied, even to those who had taken and held their land on the strength of the old and long established rule, I never heard a complaint of it. Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, the Dakotas, and all the other public-land States and Territories were homesteaded under it; and no man raised his voice, so far as I know, in protest because under the rule it sometimes occurred that a homesteader actually resided on his land with his family but four years and six months instead of five years. Is it strange that the homesteaders of to-day, confronted with harder conditions than homesteaders have heretofore encountered, should wonder why they should be the victims of a harsh rule for which there has been no public demand and which can serve no purpose save to embitter the people it affects and cause those of us who have lived among homesteaders all our lives to wonder what it is all about?

TIMBER AND STONE ENTRIES.

There is no doubt but what some land has been acquired in times past under the timber and stone act not of the character contemplated by the law. That is, the necessities of farmers and stock men for pasture, lambing grounds, and watering places has led them to make entry of land of some value for those purposes, but of little or no value for the timber or stone it contained. This fact, however, does not, in my opinion, warrant the expenditure of large sums of money in the attempt to secure the restoration to the public domain of such tracts, which are not fit for cultivation and of trifling value for any purpose.

Neither does it, in my opinion, justify a policy which, not content with placing on the timber which such a tract may contain a stumpage price fixed by an employee of the Land Office, often in excess of a reasonable valuation, insists if the land be nontimbered and claimed for its stone value on proof being furnished that an immediate and paying market exists for the stone. In the matter of the timber and stone act the position of the Land Office seems to be that if the land is practically worthless they will refuse to sell it at the statute price and will exhaust the resources of the special service to prevent its being sold.

COAL LANDS.

I have recently had some correspondence with the Secretary of the Interior relative to the classified prices of coal lands. As my object is to have the facts understood by the Secretary and not to enter into a wordy controversy, I shall not take that question up further than to reiterate that while I freely admit that it has not been the intention of any Government official having to do with these matters to create a monopoly in the hands of present owners or to raise the price of coal in the public coal-land States, the effect of the policy adopted has been to a considerable measure to bring about those results. There are other features of the coal-land policy, however, to which I desire briefly to call your attention.

I have in mind a typical instance in which some coal miners who had saved a little money were trying to open a small mine. Improvements of considerable value were made; but before entry of the tract the price had been increased to such a figure that they could not raise the sum necessary to buy 160 acres without giving some sort of a pledge to a local bank. Though the Government was asking a very high price for its land and the parties had expended a considerable sum in opening a small mine, they were informed they could not enter under these conditions, and the mine was closed. The great company operating in that field still has a monopoly. In another case, because several coal miners who had saved up some money are claimed to be jointly interested in the purchase of a 40-acre tract—which, perhaps, all had contributed to improve—one of them who applied to purchase at a high classified price is now confronted with adverse proceedings. The little mine is in jeopardy, and the great corporation which now controls the field will continue to have no competitors if this entry is canceled.

There is a considerable class of coal cases to which I have heretofore called the attention of the Secretary of the Interior in which, in my opinion, the decisions of the General Land Office savor of sharp practice, and certainly involve a repudiation of the acts of local Government officers, in harmony with long-established practice and not contrary to law. Some of these cases are now before the Secretary of the Interior for decision. Some are held in the office of the commissioner awaiting the Secretary's action on the cases before him.

With variation of detail the cases are about as follows: Qualified entrymen made application to purchase coal lands at the price which had been placed upon them by classification. Advertisement was had and the parties were notified by the local officers of the Land Office (registers and receivers, appointees of the President) that within a certain period, which they designated as the 30-day period after publication, they must complete proof and pay for the land. Within the period thus fixed by the President's appointees, local officers of the General Land Office, proof was completed and payment made.

In the cases I have reference to, it happened that subsequent to the application to purchase, in some cases subsequent to the payment of the money and completion of proof, a new classification had been made and the price of the land increased generally to a prohibitive figure; and then it was discovered in the Land Office that in these cases the 30-day period fixed by the local offices, within which proof must be completed and payment made, extended a few days (in all cases, I think, less than a week) beyond an actual 30 days after the last date of publication of proof notice in the local paper, and that payment had been made a day or two or three beyond the actual 30 days after the last day of publication, though within the period fixed by the local offices.

The regulations of the department under the coal-land law provide that "The claimant will be required within 60 days after the expiration of the period of newspaper publication to furnish the proofs specified in said paragraph and tender the purchase price of the land," and my understanding is that this period has always been the period fixed by the register and receiver until these coal-land cases came up, and a different construction would defeat the entry. The fact that the local offices, in sending notices for publication to newspapers at a distance, can not be certain as to what issue of a weekly publication will contain the first, and consequently the last publication, has resulted in the fixing of a period which in any contingency will give the claimant the full 30 days. I think there is no denial of the fact that these cases are the first in which an entry has been denied on these grounds.

SPECIAL SERVICE DIVISION.

Although the General Land Office has been generously provided for in the past few years, its appropriation for field service being now and for some years between three and four times what it was formerly when we had vastly more public lands, the work of the office in certain classes of cases is far in arrears, and an investigation of the records will disclose the fact that the increased appropriations have been more effective in creating new cases than in clearing up old ones.

The way in which new cases are created is highly interesting. For instance, many hundreds, perhaps thousands, of cases which should have been closed out in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1909, "Protection of surface rights of entryman," and the act of June 22, 1910, "To provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," were dumped into the Special Service Division of the Land Office and slowly ground out at great expense to the Government and loss and hardship to the entrymen. Recently an order has been issued referring to the Special Service Division for investigation all desert-land proofs made on lands within areas which have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as subject to the act of February 19, 1909, enlarged homestead act. No single valid reason can be given for subjecting such entrymen to the delay in securing title which such action involves which would not apply with equal or greater force to all desert entries. From the standpoint of prompt and economical administration, I am of the opinion that there can be no valid reason or excuse for the expense and delay involved in sending into the field for examination, in advance of office examination, cases in which all the papers are before the office, an examination of which would in all probability, in the large majority of cases, clearly indicate full compliance with law.

It is no doubt unfortunate that such a policy should strengthen the view held in the West that those primarily responsible for suggesting its adoption were, unconsciously or otherwise, more concerned in making cases for the Special Service Division than in properly promoting and safeguarding the passing of public lands into the hands of settlers in accordance with the law. I have frequently expressed the opinion that excessive appropriations for special service simply tempts the making of trivial and vexatious cases and subjects the entrymen to long drawn out contests with the Government. I believe the record abundantly proves that such is the fact.

I have repeatedly protested against the present practice of special agents in protesting and holding up entries and proofs without notice to the entrymen of the fact or cause of suspension. Any special agent of the department can and does, for any reason which seems good to him or for no reason at all, write "protested" on the proof papers of an entryman and by so doing suspends his proof indefinitely. Of course, there is no limit to the number of cases that can be thus created. The loss and hardship to entrymen through this practice can not be estimated. It is intolerable.

WITHDRAWALS.

In the matter of hasty and ill-considered withdrawals, there has been much improvement, though there is still reasonable and proper ground for complaint in regard to some old withdrawals. As to some of these, such as the power-site withdrawals, I realize that until a policy in regard to the matter is adopted the President would not be justified by public opinion in making sweeping restorations. There are cases, however, where withdrawals of alleged power sites are so manifestly retarding irrigation development and so seriously affecting the rights of those whose plants are, in the main, on land in private ownership as to demand prompt action.

Much complaint has reached me from those who are attempting to develop new oil and gas fields in my State to the effect that as soon as development work is started in a given locality, the agents of the Geological Survey appear and forthwith the land surrounding them is withdrawn from entry. Although such withdrawal does not necessarily prevent the perfection of title to the particular tract on which work is in progress it does prevent exploration of adjacent land, should the first location prove valueless, and in any case such extension of the field as is necessary to secure a sufficient output to warrant refineries and pipe lines. The effect of the policy has been to discourage and almost suspend the exploration and development of new fields on public lands.

Until Congress shall show some disposition to adopt new laws for the acquisition of oil and gas land, it seems to me that the present law, which is at least adapted to new fields, should be allowed to operate. All the operations to which I refer are by independent interests and generally by men and associations of limited means.

This letter is altogether too long, though it does not treat in detail a number of classes of cases of which serious complaint is made. I have written you because I feel that my duty to my constituents demands that I use my best endeavors to remedy the conditions which exist and which lead good, honest men to become thoroughly discouraged and embittered. As a supporter of the administration I also feel it my duty to acquaint you as the responsible head of the administration with our views of some of these matters before I may feel called upon to make public reference to them, that you may take such action respecting them as may seem to you proper.

I desire to have it clearly understood I have the highest personal regard for the officials in charge of these matters and agree with them on many subjects, all of which naturally inclines me to refrain, as far as is consistent with my duty to my constituents from expression of disapproval of acts and policies for which they may be in part responsible.

It has been the fashion with a certain class of people to dispose of complaints and protests coming from the West touching public-land matters by consigning those making them to the category of "land grabbers," "looters of the public domain," and "undesirable citizens." I do not anticipate such procedure in this case, and I trust that careful consideration may be given these matters, which vitally affect many good folks who desire and expect nothing more than their rights under the law and the fair, honest treatment which they are entitled to receive from their Government but powerless to enforce against it.

While this letter is not personal and you are at liberty to make such use of it as you deem best, I shall not give it publicity.

Yours, very respectfully,

_____.

Also letter to Hon. Walter L. Fisher, Secretary of the Interior, June 24, 1911, on the subject of public coal lands, as follows:

PUBLIC COAL LANDS.

JUNE 24, 1911.

Hon. WALTER L. FISHER,
Secretary of the Interior, City.

SIR: Prior to 1873 the public lands of the United States were disposed of without taking into consideration the question as to whether or not they contained coal, and therefore all the lands containing anthracite and bituminous coal in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia, and most of such lands in Alabama, passed into private ownership as agricultural lands and at nominal prices.

In 1873 Congress passed the coal-land law, providing for the sale of coal lands at not less than $10 per acre, where such lands were more than 15 miles from a completed railroad, and not less than $20 per acre for such lands as were within 15 miles of a railroad, and from that time until 1907 coal lands were sold at the prices named in the law.

In 1907 the policy of considering the price of $10 and $20 per acre, fixed by law, the minimum price and of selling coal lands at a classified price in excess of the minimum was adopted. For a time the classified prices were not generally greatly in excess of the minimum prices, but gradually those prices have been increased by reclassification (in some cases the same lands have been classified three times) and by higher original classifications until, according to a statement recently made by the Director of the Geological Survey, the classification of 14,473,609 acres made prior to March 31, 1911, had raised the valuation of these lands from $236,460,613, under the minimum prices fixed by law, to $668,433,342 under classification.

The mere statement of an increase in valuation to nearly three times that fixed by the statute does not, however, give an adequate idea of the actual conditions in the fields where coal is being mined, for in such localities the classified price is from ten to twenty-five times the statute price.

The comparatively low average increase in valuation is due to the fact that much of the land which has been classified contains, or is believed to contain, thin veins or deposits of low-grade lignite coal having no present market value and not salable at any price as coal land. These lands have largely been classified at or near the minimum price, thus keeping down the general average. On the other hand, in all of the fields where the coal is of sufficiently high grade to be workable, or is being worked, the prices, even for lands far from means of transportation, have been increased from the minimum fixed by law to from $150 to $500 per acre.

Whatever one's views may be as to the proper interpretation of the coal-land law, and therefore as to authority of executive officers to fix prices above those contained in the statute, there is much force to the argument that the value of coal-bearing land differs so widely, and the temptation to large holdings, particularly in fields of exceptional quality, is so great, that a graduated price rather than a flat rate is the better from the standpoint of public policy. However, as it has never been the policy of the Government to attempt to secure an exorbitant price for its lands by creating a land monopoly, it would seem logical that under a system of valuation the price should be fixed with a view of discouraging the acquisition of lands for speculative purposes rather than with the intent of capitalizing the necessities of citizens who must have coal of which the Government has a monopoly.

The first prices fixed under classification were in the main not excessive, though quite high enough to discourage purchase except with a view of immediate development, and therefore though the policy involved a questionable exercise of executive authority there was a general disposition in the country affected to withhold criticism and give the new policy a fair trial. The reclassifications and increased valuations, however, have placed coal lands at such prohibitive figures and contemplate such a serious burden on western communities that the people of the public coal land States have become thoroughly aroused over the situation, and as the Representative of the people of one of the States whose citizens are suffering and are certain to suffer more from the effect of the present policy, I feel it my duty to call these matters to your attention, in the hope that the present policy may be radically modified.

The valuations which have been fixed on public coal lands in Wyoming, Colorado, Montana, Utah, New Mexico, and other Western States are, in my opinion, so beyond all reason and justification that I find it difficult to discuss the subject in an entirely dispassionate and respectful way, for to characterize the policy and procedure which has been pursued in what I believe to be a fitting manner would require the use of language more forceful and pointed than I care to use in a communication of this character. If the situation were not so serious, it would be somewhat relieved by the large element of grim humor it contains in the assumption that the Government is to secure at some time in the future the extravagant prices which have been laboriously figured out, and that therefore those responsible for the classifications have added hundreds of millions to the national wealth by the simple process of giving free rein to their imagination.

It should be remembered that most of the coal in the public lands, estimated to underly at least 50,000,000 acres, is lignite or subbituminous coal and, compared with the best bituminous coals of the eastern part of the United States, is of low grade; little of it will make coke, and much of it would not be sold in competition with high-grade bituminous coal.

The prices fixed by classification in all the better fields are, however, very much higher than the average prices asked by private owners for the high-grade bituminous coal contained in lands in Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, West Virginia, and elsewhere. The surface of much of the coal lands in the States mentioned is valuable, while the surface of most of the Government coal lands is of trifling value and can be secured by homesteading; and yet the average classified prices are higher than is asked for the better coals and highly valuable surface in States adjacent to markets. A disinterested investigation will prove the truth of these assertions.

It is perhaps a matter of no present material consequence, though rather ridiculous, that lands containing, or which are believed to contain by the Geological Survey, lignite coal of poor or medium quality and so remote from transportation and markets as to have no present value for coal should be valued at hundreds of dollars per acre; but it is a matter of the highest immediate importance that coal lands in the vicinity of means of transportation and for the product of which enterprising men are willing to take a chance of finding a market are held at prices which prohibit development, create a monopoly in the mines now in operation, and thus materially advance the price of coal to the consumer in a country having millions of acres of coal lands. The net result of the classification policy in the Rocky Mountain region has been to prohibit the opening of new mines and to increase the price of coal to the consumer from 50 cents to $1 per ton.

While the major portion of the coal lands in fields of fair or good quality and where transportation makes development possible have been valued for sale at from $200 to $450 per acre, the highest price at which any public coal land has been sold is $180 per acre, and only two 40-acre tracts at that price—tracts probably essential to the extension of developed mines. In 1909, 80 acres were sold at $135 per acre; one tract of 160 acres was sold at $75 per acre; and with these exceptions and one sale of 40 acres at $65 per acre no coal lands have been sold at more than $50 per acre.

The total sales of coal lands at prices above $30 per acre since September, 1907, when the first classified lands were sold, has been as follows:

Price per acre:	Acres.
$35	239
$40	720
$45	240
$50	7,650
$65	40
$75	161
$135	80
$180	80
Total acres	9,210

When we take into consideration that this constitutes the entire coal-land sales by the Government in over four years at classified prices above $30 in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, where the Government owns millions of acres of classified lands rated above the highest price paid by these purchasers, we can realize how the coal industry has been paralyzed by the prohibitive prices which have been placed on coal lands.

It is conceded that if these exorbitant prices are retained on coal lands, and the remainder of the public coal lands are listed at the same excessive prices, eventually some high-priced land will be sold, for as the privately owned coal lands are worked out and the coal sold at the prices which the Government monopoly makes possible the time will come when the necessities of the people for fuel will compel the sale of some of the Government land, no matter how high the price may be, and the people of the West will be compelled to pay liberally for the monopoly thus fostered by Government policy. In the meanwhile no complaint has been or will be heard of the new policy of exacting the last possible penny for Government coal lands from the coal operators who own large bodies of coal lands. The plan is an ideal one for them.

If it is to be urged that the high price now asked for Government coal land, far above what the most grasping private owner would think of asking, will conserve our coal, we must admit that it will have that tendency by taking coal from the category of a necessity and placing it among the luxuries. But this is a Government policy which is not likely to be tolerated in a region whose fuel resources are inexhaustible. Practically none of the coal from what is now Government land can ever be profitably shipped east of the Missouri River, and if it could, Wyoming alone could supply the entire country at our present rate of consumption for over 700 years, according to Government estimates.

The question of the disposition of the coal on Government land, so far as the use of the coal is concerned, is one affecting only the people of the country west of the Missouri, and the people of that region, not blessed as is the territory further east with bountiful supplies of high-grade bituminous coals, but nevertheless fortunate in an inexhaustible supply of coal, such as it is, should not be expected to agree to a policy which creates a monopoly by Government action and which contemplates laying on them and their decendants a burden for fuel amounting to many hundreds of millions of dollars, no part of which is proposed to be returned to the people who pay it.

I trust you will find time to give this matter your careful consideration at an early date. The policy of prohibitive coal-land prices, which proposes a grievous burden on our people and an entire reversal of our governmental policy, has never been approved by Congress or formally indorsed by any branch of our Government. It has simply grown out of the activities of a single bureau of the Interior Department, and it has been suggested that the determination to force a coal-leasing system on the country is largely responsible for the prohibitive prices at which coal lands have been classified. If the leasing system has virtues and advantages, and no doubt it has some, they should be apparent enough to bring about the adoption of the system otherwise than by prohibiting sales of coal lands through hostile administration of the coal-land law and prohibitive or grievously burdensome coal-land prices.

The coal-land law as now interpreted by the department is inadequate in that it renders practically impossible the assembling of a sufficient area for a modern mine. The policy of selling at a classified price high enough to discourage purchases of coal lands purely for speculation or future development has its advantages with our law as interpreted in protecting operators unable to secure large holdings against purchases by others of land in advance of and necessary to the extension of their operations with a view of speculation at their expense; but this merit and such others as may be claimed for the system of classification are entirely negatived by the extraordinary prices adopted which create a burdensome monopoly in coal lands and lead to a monopoly of coal prices. We shall in all probability never return to the nominal prices named in the coal statute, but every consideration of sound public policy dictates values that shall not lay grievous burdens not contemplated by Congress on the users of coal in one portion of our country, and every proper purpose claimed for the policy of classification will be served by values high enough to discourage the purchase of coal land for speculation. The experience of the last few years seems to indicate that with the possible exception of very rare cases $50 per acre is about a fair maximum rather than $500.

Very respectfully, yours,

F. W. MONDELL.

Also letter to the Secretary of the Interior under date of February 17, 1913, on the subject of the sale of isolated tracts of public lands, as follows:

ISOLATED TRACTS.

FEBRUARY 17, 1913.

Hon. WALTER L. FISHER,
Secretary of the Interior.

SIR: My attention has been called to circular No. 202, of December 18, 1912, of your department, relating to the sale of isolated tracts under section 2455, Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 28, 1912, and the act of April 30, 1912, relating to the sale, under limited patent, of isolated tracts of coal land. I realize that the sale of lands under these statutes is entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, or, in the language of the act of March 28, 1912, in the discretion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. This being true, I presume that officers thus granted discretion under the law could decline to allow any tracts to be sold. Inasmuch, however, as Congress in enacting the law contemplated that lands would be disposed of under it, I assume that no Secretary would feel justified in promulgating rules which would so discourage applications as to practically repeal the law. In this view of the matter I invite your attention to some of the provisions of the recent circular which, in my opinion, have the effect of very greatly discouraging applications to purchase, and if retained in force will finally render the act practically a dead letter.

The isolated-tract law as amended authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of any isolated or disconnected tract not exceeding one quarter section. The circular in question lays down the rule that no tract will be deemed isolated and ordered into market which has not, at the time application is filed, been subject to homestead entry for at least two years after surrounding lands have been entered, filed upon, or sold.

Exception is made to this rule "where some extraordinary reason, in the opinion of the commissioner, warrants the waiving of the rule." I can not conceive of any reason which could be advanced which would be likely to be considered sufficient; therefore the rule prevails. This restrictive rule, together with the rule requiring a report and appraisal by a field officer, was adopted in a former circular issued during your administration of the department, and therefore are not new features, but I refer to them because, coupled with new restrictions, they create a situation under which sales of isolated tracts will be greatly discouraged.

The first new feature of the recent circular to which I desire to call your attention is that which requires applicants to deposit with their application the minimum value of the lands the sale of which is desired, amounting to $1.25 or $2.50 per acre, depending on whether the lands are within railroad limits.

My experience is that the great majority of those who apply to have isolated tracts ordered into market are people of comparatively limited means; few of them have any considerable sums of money laid aside or which they can spare from their business. Without being accurately informed on the subject, I venture the opinion that the period intervening between an application and a decision will on an average approximate two years. In our western country money is worth at least 10 per cent to the average individual, so that an applicant with his money on deposit for that length of time would, if a successful bidder at the sale, pay 20 per cent of the minimum price more than the tract would cost an outside bidder. As the parties applying to have the tract ordered into market must also pay for publication, affidavits, etc., this additional expense is a serious handicap.

Under the former practice the lands remained subject to entry and disposition until the sale was ordered. Under the recent circular they remain subject to entry or disposition down to the time when the sale is consummated, thus placing additional risk on the applicant, making his opportunity to purchase still more uncertain and rendering him liable to be victimized by parties in position to threaten the entry of the tract at the last moment.

I am assuming that in the issuance of this circular it was not the intent of your office to surround the offer of isolated tracts with such conditions as would seriously discourage any application for the sale of said lands, but from a knowledge of conditions in the public-land States, gained through many years of residence, I am of the opinion that the circular will practically put an end to applications for the sale of lands under the isolated-tract law, whatever the intent in the issuance of the circular may have been.

In this connection I think it proper that I should call your attention to the fact that Congress has for a number of years, whenever it has legislated on the subject, steadily liberalized the isolated-tract laws. Formerly a tract must have been isolated at least two years, and only tracts of less than 160 acres could be sold. The law was liberalized so as to allow sales immediately upon tracts being isolated by entries and enlarging the area of sale to 160 acres. This was done with the acquiescence and largely at the suggestion of a former Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Hitchcock. Later, and quite recently, Congress has extended the isolated-tract law under limited patent to coal lands. It has authorized, under the general terms of the statute, the sale of lands rough, mountainous, or unfit for cultivation upon the application of an adjoining owner without the requirement that the lands shall be isolated and disconnected. All of these acts clearly indicate the policy of Congress and its appreciation of the fact that it is to the interest of the public to have lands which do not appeal to the homestead entryman sold and placed upon the tax list; to have those owning lands adjacent to rough and mountainous lands given an opportunity to enlarge their holdings.

As those matters are well known to your office I assume that in the administration of the law it is your desire to carry out the purpose of the lawmaking body. I am at a loss to understand the consideration which prompted the issuance of these regulations. In my opinion they amount to a notice to the people that the Secretary of the Interior does not approve of the sale of public lands under these laws and therefore adopts rules to discourage and prevent such sales.

If this is not the view of the matter taken by your department, I trust there may be such modification of the regulations as will remove the present practical prohibition.

Very truly, yours,

F. W. MONDELL.

Also letter of March 22, 1913, to Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, relative to ceded lands of the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in Wyoming, and their disposition, as follows:

MARCH 22, 1913.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.

SIR: On March 3, 1905 (p. 1016, 33 Stat.), an act was approved which ratified and amended the treaty with the Indians residing on the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation, in the State of Wyoming, and providing for the disposition of certain lands which the Indians had agreed should be disposed of.

The lands referred to embraced the northern portion of the Wind River Reservation, between the Wind River on the south and Owl Creek on the north, a territory from 20 to 35 miles in width and 60 miles in length, and containing approximately 1,438,633 acres. Section 2 of the legislation in question provided that the said lands should be disposed of under the provisions of the "homestead, town-site, coal, and mineral land laws of the United States."

It was also provided that "all lands, except mineral and coal lands herein ceded, remaining undisposed of at the expiration of five years from the opening of said lands to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder, for cash, at not less than $1 per acre, under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That any lands remaining unsold eight years after the said lands shall have been open to entry may be sold to the highest bidder, for cash, without regard to the above minimum limit of price."

The five years above referred to expired August 15, 1911, and the first sale was had in September, 1912, at which time 52,319 acres were disposed of. Prior to that time 128,963 acres had been entered under the homestead and other laws; 335,000 acres have been segregated under the Carey Act for reclamation, leaving 922,351 acres to be sold.

It will be noted that the provision of sale after five years excepted "mineral and coal lands," and the general understanding or interpretation of that language was that it referred to coal lands, of which there is a small area, and lands which had been filed upon as mineral lands under the mining laws.

When the time arrived for the lands to be sold, however, it was discovered that very large areas of lands had been withdrawn from entry and classified as petroleum, phosphate, coal, gold-placer, or power-site lands; and these lands so withdrawn from entry constituted so large a proportion of salable lands, or so interspersed the salable lands, as to very greatly hamper and restrict sales.

Referring first to the legal aspect of the case, I desire to call your attention to the fact that these lands are not public lands in the general acceptance of that term. As article 9 of the treaty provides:

"ART. 9. It is understood that nothing in this agreement contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any portion of the lands herein described or to dispose of said lands except as provided herein or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any portion thereof, it being the understanding that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands, and to expend for said Indians and pay over to them the proceeds received from the sale thereof."

The lands not being public lands, but Indian lands held in trust, they can be handled only under the terms of the trust, therefore they must be disposed of under the homestead, coal, and mineral laws or sold as above provided

What has been done, however, is to withdraw a large portion of these lands from any sort of disposition on the theory apparently that they are public lands, that they contain mineral or are valuable for power sites, and that the public interest demands that they shall be reserved and not disposed of at all.

GOLD PLACER.

Looking at the matter from the standpoint of the facts of the situation, this is what is discovered with regard to these alleged mineral lands, the location of which is shown on the map which I file herewith.

Several thousand acres of the lands referred to have been withdrawn from entry on the theory that they contain values in gold placer, and in some cases these alleged gold-placer lands extend back as much as a mile from the river. This withdrawal of alleged gold placer has subjected the department to more ridicule in that part of the country than anything which has been done in connection with public lands, and that is saying a great deal. One time or another we have met men who dreamed dreams of gold placers in many localities, but the wildest of all the gold-placer hunters have never imagined that gold was to be found in the solid deposits along the Big Wind River. It is true that for a number of years past two different outfits have been spending money attempting to extract some gold from shifting sand bars in the Big Wind River, but it is also true that the expenditure of large sums of money for expensive dredges have not so far brought any appreciable returns, and if there is any gold that can be saved or secured at a reasonable cost from the shifting sand bars of the Big Wind River, which is very doubtful, all such deposits will be found in and on the said sand bars within the meander lines of the said stream; and the department simply subjects itself to scorn and ridicule, besides retarding settlement and development, by such reservations as have been made.

COAL LANDS.

The lands withdrawn as coal lands constitute comparatively a small portion of the area of the ceded lands, and so far as these lands contain coal of a workable thickness and merchantable character they should only be disposed of under the coal-land law in accordance with the terms of the act. The probability is, however, that the area withdrawn includes lands which do not contain merchantable coal, and the objection to the withdrawal is that it does not now allow for disposition under the coal-land laws, though perhaps that is not important as a practical proposition, as I do not know that anyone desires to purchase the lands.

OIL LANDS.

Two areas, one containing about 2,000 acres in township 3 north, range 1 west, and one farther north, some 15 miles in length and 3 to 5 miles in width, have been withdrawn as oil land. It is true that oil is found on the diminished reserve, 10 or 15 miles south of these lands, and there may also be a possibility that at some time oil may be discovered on some of the lands now withdrawn, but I think that no one will deny the proposition that these withdrawals are pure guesses, and that at any rate, in accordance with the terms of the law for the disposition of these lands, these tracts must either be sold, where their mineral character is not to be reasonably inferred from indications, or remain subject to entry under the placer acts under which oil lands are now enterable. I do not know that anyone desires to file on these lands as oil lands; I have heard no such suggestion, but my view is that in the first place the oil withdrawals should be very greatly reduced if retained at all; and that under the law if any lands are declared to be oil lands they must remain subject to the mineral laws.

PHOSPHATE LANDS.

We now reach the character of withdrawals which most seriously affect the development of the region in question and which, in my opinion, are, without possible exceptance of the so-called placer withdrawals, least justifiable or defendable. I refer to the so-called phosphate withdrawals. One time and another in the rise and fall of the mining excitements in our State a considerable part of our territory has been claimed, by one class or another of boomers, to be valuable for some sort of mineral, but it remained for the experts of the Geological Survey to discover valuable phosphates, or any phosphates at all, in this part of the State. I am not informed as to what enthusiastic member of the survey made the startling discovery that about 150,000 acres of this land was underlaid with phosphate, and I do not know by what process he outlined these valuable phosphate beds. The fact is that the most persistent prospecting on the part of many individuals in this region has failed to discover any phosphate at all. If the area of alleged phosphate was not so great the matter might be treated as a joke; covering the area that it does, located as the lands withdrawn are, it is a very serious matter in retarding the development of this region. I give it as the opinion of men who have investigated this matter since the department officials made, in Washington, the discovery of this mineral 1,800 miles away that there is no land in the entire section referred to which possesses any indication whatever of being underlaid with phosphate beds that would be of value anywhere in the world.

In my opinion the designation in question is not only contrary to law, not only involves a waste of public money, but is exceedingly harmful to the public service, as it creates the impression in the locality that these things are done either in pure ignorance or for ulterior purposes having no connection with any mineral development.

POWER SITES.

These lands not being public lands there is no authority in any law for the reservation of any of the lands as power sites, and, with the exception of lands in the canyon of Big Wind River above Thermopolis, most of the lands withdrawn would be of no value as power sites under any conceivable condition.

PRACTICAL EFFECTS.

The practical effect of these withdrawals has been to limit and restrict the sale of these lands, to the very great detriment and injury of the country and of the Indians.

Congress has already advanced to the Indians, who own these lands, large sums of money for irrigation works and for other expenditures on their diminished reserve, and it is highly important that they begin to realize by the sale of their lands, as the funds are needed for further improvement of their reservation. It is important, also, that these lands pass into private ownership and get on the tax rolls as rapidly as they can consistently. None of the lands subject to sale are irrigable. A considerable portion of the land has but very little value, but other portions are fairly good grazing lands, and if sold in reasonable areas could be disposed of to the benefit of the Indians and of the community. It so happens that a considerable portion of the most desirable of the lands and those most salable are contained in the phosphate withdrawals. That is particularly true of the lands west of the Big Wind River, in townships 5 and 6 north, ranges 3, 4, 5, and 6 east. In this locality there are some lands that could be utilized for dry-farming purposes, and the people who know these lands are so well satisfied that they contain no phosphates that they openly charge that the phosphate withdrawal is in the interest of large stockmen who do not want to have the lands sold.

WHAT SHOULD BE DONE.

I most earnestly request that the matters to which I have referred be taken up for thorough and careful consideration. I earnestly recommend that whatever is done shall be done in accordance with the laws relating to and affecting these lands. I recommend that the so-called gold placer and phosphate withdrawals be restored; that the coal and oil areas be reduced to such lands as may be reasonably held to be valuable for these minerals and subjected to the laws for the disposition of such minerals.

I do not believe, as I have before stated, that there is any authority for power-site withdrawals on these lands, and I doubt the necessity of any such withdrawals. At any rate, it is ridiculous to maintain such withdrawals on streams like Owl Creek and the North Fork of the Big Wind River. The lands have no value for power-site purposes, but they are of some value for grazing or agricultural purposes.

Very truly, yours,

Also letter to Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, under date of May 23, on the subject of oil-land withdrawals, and with particular reference to the Moorcroft, Wyo., oil field, as follows:

MOORCROFT OIL FIELD.

MAY 23, 1913.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.

SIR: I am in receipt of a telegram and I have a letter from the Moorcroft Commercial Club, of Moorcroft, Wyo., protesting against Order of Withdrawal, Petroleum Reserve No. 28, Wyoming, No. 7, which withdrawal I find on investigation covers a large portion of lands in townships 50 and 51, range 66 west; townships 50, 51, and 52, range 67 west; and townships 51 and 52, range 68 west. The telegram and letter I have received inform me that a considerable portion of this land has been located as oil placer lands, and that preparations were being made for the active development of the lands for oil in the immediate future. The letter I have from the secretary of the club states "it is safe to say that a quarter of a million would have been spent here this season." I take it for granted that on comparatively little of the land was the work of development actively going on at the time of withdrawal, and therefore the withdrawal probably suspends all operations in this field for the present, causing great losses. In the southern part of this field more or less drilling for oil has been done for more than 20 years, and some 4 or 5 years ago many thousands of dollars was spent in drilling.

While much of this work resulted in the discovery of oil, the discoveries have not been in quantities to warrant providing transportation facilities to market the oil. Recent investigations in the field by experts have located what are probably the most promising points of development, and just as this had been accomplished and development was about to start in a large way lands are withdrawn and everything brought to a standstill.

This history of the Moorcroft field is but a repetition of the experience we have had in Wyoming for the last five or six years. Whenever some one ventures to undertake to develop oil lands, and the prospects of finding oil seems to be at all promising, the agents of the Geological Survey swoop down on the territory, withdraw the land, and prohibit further extended development. That has been the history in the Casper field, in the Cody field, in the vicinity of Cowley, and at a number of other points in the State where we are attempting to develop oil.

I can not believe that if the present practice in this regard is fully understood it will be continued by your department. It is exasperating to the last degree, and it is particularly trying just at this time when few of our industries are prosperous, and we have hoped for development through independent operations in oil in various parts of the State.

It is true that the withdrawal act gives the President authority to withdraw lands, but no one ever contemplated that that power would be used to prevent development in an ordinary way under the only law which has been provided by Congress for oil development. It has been frequently suggested that wholesale withdrawals are made of every promising oil region with a view of forcing Members of Congress to lend their influence to the prompt passage of an oil-leasing bill. However that may be, a policy which ties up and withholds from use needed resources is one which no one can justify. Congress long since extended the placer acts to this class of entries, and while there may be some argument as to the law being a perfect one under all conditions, no one, so far as I know, has claimed that the act does not work well under the conditions existing in Wyoming, where fields are new and the drilling very largely in the nature of "wildcatting," as the term is used in the oil business.

I can not believe that you will give your assent to the continued tying up of our resources, and I earnestly hope that the lands in the Moorcroft field, and other lands which independent operators are anxious to develop, may be released from withdrawal.

Very truly, yours,

F. W. MONDELL.

Also letter to Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, under date of May 27, 1913, on the subject of repayment of money paid on land entries which were not perfected, as follows:

REPAYMENT ON LAND ENTRIES.

MAY 27, 1913.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On the 22d of April I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two joint memorials of the Legislature of Wyoming and made some observations relative thereto. One of these resolutions was a protest against certain features of the administration of the land laws which the protestants claimed retarded the irrigation, reclamation, and settlement of our public lands. This resolution also criticized certain acts of special agents and favored an enlarged and additional homestead law. The other resolution, to which I now particularly call your attention, relates exclusively to the policy of the Interior Department in the matter of repayment of moneys paid by entrymen and purchasers under the homestead, the timber and stone, and the desert-land acts, and the coal-land laws.

Copies of these resolutions were placed before Congress soon after their adoption by the legislature, but as under the practice of the House resolutions of this sort do not appear in the RECORD when presented in the usual way I took this method of having them appear, and while copies of these resolutions were probably sent to your predecessor I presume you have not seen them, therefore I now respectfully call them to your attention.

With a view of having Congress secure information as to the exact status of applications for repayments, I introduced some time ago a House resolution which I hope to have reported as soon as committees are appointed, which resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to furnish the House of Representatives a list of all applications for repayment of money paid on public-land applications, selections, entries, and proofs which have been pending in the Interior Department over three months, with character of application, selection, entry, or proof, name of land district, of applicant, and amount involved."

As you are aware, the original act—and one of most general application to repayments of money paid in land purchases and entries—is the act of June 16, 1880 (21 Stat., 287). This act provides, among other things, for the repayment of all moneys which have been paid on account of homestead, timber-culture, desert-land, or other entries, which entries were canceled for conflict or, having been erroneously allowed, could not be confirmed. This remained our only general repayment statute until the passage of the act of March 26, 1908 (35 Stat., 48), which act was drawn in the Interior Department and its passage recommended on the ground that there were certain classes of applications for repayment which the statute of June 16, 1880, did not cover and that additional legislation was necessary.

While the department recommended the passage of this last act on the ground that it was necessary to cover certain classes of cases which the old law did not cover, I notice that the circular of July 23, 1910, states that the later act refers more particularly to moneys deposited with proof under the timber and stone, desert-land, coal-land, or other mineral-land laws. This view of the statute is illuminating because of the fact that while, unlike the statute of 1880, the later act provides for repayment in all cases where applications, entries, or proofs have been rejected for any reason, there is a provision that "such applicant, nor his legal representative, shall have been guilty of any fraud in connection with such application."

The statute of 1880 above referred to clearly covers the great majority of cases of applications for repayment under most of the land laws. This is particularly true as to moneys paid under the timber and stone act. By a curious process of reasoning, the Land Office has held in a number of cases that had the land been of the character which the applicant asserted it was the entry could have been perfected, but as the office, or rather the special agent, held that the land had not been described with absolute accuracy by the applicant and was not, in the opinion of the agent, land that ought to be sold under the timber and stone law, therefore the entry was not, in the sense contemplated by the statute, "erroneously allowed," although as a matter of fact the entry was canceled on the ground that the land was not timber and stone land.

Having by this circuitous process of reasoning taken the case out from under the mandatory statute of June 16, 1880, the Land Office has then proceeded to hold that the cases are not entitled to repayment under the statute of March 26, 1908, because the applicant or his legal representatives "had been guilty of fraud or attempted fraud" in describing the land.

Similar processes of reasoning have resulted in the denial of a large number of applications for repayment under the commutation clause of the homestead law, under the desert-land act, the coal-land law, as well as the timber and stone act. From time to time I have called to the attention of your office and the commissioner's office cases of such applications which have been called to my attention by my constituents, and from information thus secured I feel constrained to say that, in my opinion, the policy which has been pursued in denying repayments in a large number of cases has been not only contrary to the letter and the spirit of the law, but little short of a public scandal.

I know that it will be vigorously insisted as a defense for the policy under which a great Nation retains the money of its citizens without giving anything in return that there have been fraudulent applications; that men have applied for and purchased lands knowing they were not entitled to them; that they had not complied with the law; that they had made statements relative to them which were not true. It would be very extraordinary indeed if among the many thousands of transactions in public lands between the Government and its citizens there were no cases of fraud or attempted fraud. However this may be, it is unquestionably true that the statute of 1880 did not contemplate that, even in a case where fraud was attempted or charged, the offending party was to be punished by confiscation of his property; hence the peculiar reasoning by which the majority of cases are held not to come within the provisions of that act.

When we come to consider the act of March 26, 1908, within the provisions of which it is now sought to bring practically all applications, it may be said that while the repayment is predicated to a certain extent on the proposition that the applicant or his legal representatives shall not have been guilty of fraud or attempted fraud, the act certainly did not contemplate that a mere suspicion or inference on the part of an official of the Government should be conclusive proof of fraud and warrant the taking of the property of a citizen "without due process of law."

So far as I am acquainted with these matters, applications for repayment under timber and stone entries seem to be the most numerous. For many years it was the practice of the Land Office to sell, under the timber and stone act, almost any tract of rough, broken, rocky land unfit for cultivation which contained brush or brushy timber or rock, and it is undoubtedly true that in many instances these lands were purchased not because the timber or stone on them had any considerable value, but because the tract was of some little value for the firewood it furnished or as an addition to the farm or ranch for pasture purposes. Several years ago the department began to cancel entries on lands of that character, and, although it is not claimed that the lands have any considerable value or that they are in fact worth more than was paid for them, repayment on the canceled entries is denied on the ground that the entryman did not, in the opinion of the agent, accurately describe the land. This alleged inaccuracy of description is the excuse for punishing an applicant by keeping his $400 in the case of a 160-acre entry, besides depriving him of his entry.

In the case of some applications for repayment under the desert-land act and the coal-land act to which my attention has been called the alleged frauds which are made the basis of the confiscation of the entryman's cash are not such as, in my opinion, would be held as frauds by any court of law. It seems to have become popular for the Government to confiscate the money of entrymen on the most flimsy pretext of alleged fraud. My attention has also been called to the fact that the Government has refused to make repayment in cases of commuted homestead entries which were not accepted. There is, I believe, such a ruling in Thirty-ninth Land Decisions, page 152. This ruling has not the excuse of alleged fraud and works hardship in numerous cases.

I sincerely hope and trust that you will find time to thoroughly investigate the matter of repayments and that you will modify the practice which has recently grown up of withholding the money paid by entrymen in cases where the Government refuses to consummate the purchase or the entry.

Very truly, yours,

F. W. MONDELL.

Also letter to Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, under date of June 6, 1913, signed by the members of the Wyoming delegation in Congress, asking for the restoration to entry of oil and gas lands in the vicinity of Basin and Greybull, Wyo., as follows:

GAS LANDS, BASIN AND GREYBULL.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1913.

HON. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.

SIR: We are inclosing herewith petitions signed by good and representative citizens of Basin and Greybull, Wyo., requesting the restoration to entry of lands in the vicinity of these towns now withdrawn as oil and gas lands.

The situation is briefly as follows: A number of years ago, after considerable drilling in the locality, a gas well was developed near the town of Greybull. After many vicissitudes and much delay capital was secured, and a considerable number of wells were drilled and pipe lines were laid to supply Basin, 10 miles distant, and Greybull with gas. Last year the supply from these wells proving inadequate, further wells were drilled on patented land, but they have not materially added to the supply. The company operating in this field has, we are informed, found it difficult to secure funds for further drilling on lands on which they applied for patent several years ago, and now await action on the third inspection of the said lands, which has been ordered by the General Land Office.

Some time since all public lands in the vicinity which gave promise of yielding oil or gas were withdrawn from all forms of entry, and it is the restoration of these lands which is now sought. We can not urge too strongly upon you the importance to the people of the towns of Basin and Greybull and the surrounding country of having an opportunity given for the further development of this gas and oil field. The people have discarded their stoves and furnaces for gas ranges and heaters, and now find the gas supply wholly inadequate for their needs, with every prospect of a complete failure of supply unless more territory is opened to exploration. Those who have, with great courage, made large investments to prove the extent and value of the field are threatened with a total loss of all investment, while a very considerable area of lands believed to be oil and gas producing—mostly barren hills having no other value whatever—are tied up by withdrawal. We most earnestly urge that relief be granted at once in order that drilling may be speedily undertaken, as the region is one in which it is practically impossible to drill after winter sets in.

Very truly, yours,

F. W. MONDELL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HELM). The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, Goldsmith, in "The Deserted Village," says:

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker—

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.
> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,—
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroy'd, can never be supplied.

One of the results of the recent discussion of the high cost of living is a revival of interest in country life, for all recognize that upon the prosperity and efficiency of agriculture depends the supply of our food as well as the materials for clothing, and these constitute the principal items in that cost. When President Roosevelt appointed his country-life commission and sent its report to Congress and recommended an appropriation to continue the work it met with a cold reception, and no action was ever taken thereon. It is not necessary to discuss the causes for this neglect except to say that it was largely due to personal hostility on the part of leaders in Congress to President Roosevelt and his big-stick methods by which he had already forced from them popular legislation like the Hepburn railroad law and antitrust laws generally. Many of them felt that he was undertaking too many reforms at the same time, from spelling reform to regulating the size of the family, and hence condemned his country-life policy without a hearing. The time has now come when, I think, this prejudice has subsided and when this question can be considered on its merits. The question is world-wide in its importance and affects the future permanency of our institutions and civilization. "The well-being of the people is like a tree—agriculture is its root, manufacture and commerce are its branches and its life; if the root is injured the leaves fall, the branches break away, and the tree dies."

The last census shows that for the last decade the rate of increase for the population of the urban areas was over three times that for the population living in rural territory. Of the total increase in the population of the United States during the past decade—15,997,691—seven-tenths was in urban and only three-tenths in rural territory. Population in cities, villages, and towns of 2,500 or less is classed as rural, so that if these were eliminated not over 40 per cent is actually rural. This tendency to desert the country for the city has been commented on and deplored by teachers and publicists, but nothing has been done to stop it. On the contrary, the politicians seized upon the prevailng high price for the necessaries of life, and began to blame the farmer for the high cost of living, and to demand free trade in farm products. The Secretary of Agriculture instituted an inquiry into the matter in 1910 and found that the farmers were not receiving exorbitant prices for their products, but that before they reached the consumer the price was doubled by the profits of the middleman and suggested that the problem of reducing the cost of distribution was up to the consumer. We have not yet heard of any move on the part of business men, on the part of leaders in the commercial world, to solve the problem of high cost of living by reducing middle profits, and I fear we never will. Congress, however, authorized the Department of Agriculture "to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with marketing and distributing farm products," and appropriated $50,000 therefor. Under this authority the Secretary has lately established a so-called Bureau of Markets and Bureau of Farm Organization, through which it is proposed to carry on a campaign for cheaper distribution of farm products, including the organization of cooperative associations of both producers and consumers. This will be largely a work of propaganda, for it is clear that the Government can do little or nothing except to encourage and stimulate the people to help themselves in the manner pointed out. If the consumer can by this means obtain cheaper supplies and the farmer better prices, it will surely be worth the effort; but thereby the problem of country life will by no means be solved.

Sir Horace Plunkett, the Irish statesman and apostle of cooperation, who has done such great work for agriculture in his own country, published in 1910 a very instructive book on the subject The Rural Life Problem of the United States, in which, as a step toward the solution of the problem, he proposes the formation of two organizations, one designed to carry on a popular propagandist organizing campaign, the other an institution for scientific and philosophic research relative to the problems of country life. The Department of Agriculture, by the establishment of the Bureau of Farm Organization and Markets, has undertaken the first part of the work suggested as needful by Sir Horace, and now I am proposing in the bill I have introduced in the present Congress to establish a country-life institute to carry on the second part of that work. In speaking of the proposed institute he said:

The country-life institute would be on a wholly different footing. Its researches, if only to subserve the country-life movement in the United States, would have to range over the civilized world, and to be historical as well as contemporary. It should be regarded as a contribution to the welfare of the English-speaking peoples, one aspect of whose civilization—if there be truth in what I have written—needs to be reconsidered in the light which the institute is designed to afford. Its task will be of no ephemeral character. Its success will not, as in the case of the active propagandist body, lessen the need for its services, but will rather stimulate the demand for them.

Let me summarize this case. I have tried to show that modern civilization is one sided to a dangerous degree—that it has concentrated itself in the towns and left the country derelict. This tendency is peculiar to the English-speaking communities, where the great industrial movement has had as its consequence the rural problem I have examined. If the townward tendency can not be checked it will ultimately bring about the decay of the towns themselves, and of our whole civilization, for the towns draw their supply of population from the country. Moreover, the waste of natural resources and possibly the alarming increase in the price of food which have lately attracted so much attention in America, are largely due to the fact that those who cultivate the land do not intend to spend their lives upon it, and without a rehabilitation of country life there can be no success for the conservation policy. Therefore the country-life movement deals with what is probably the most important problem before the English-speaking peoples at this time. Now the predominance of the towns which is depressing the country is based partly on a fuller application of modern physical science, partly on superior business organization, partly on facilities for occupation and amusement, and if the balance is to be redressed the country must be improved in all three ways.

Cities are being made very attractive. We know that in these modern times the taxpayers willingly contribute to the extension of the parks, the widening of the streets, to the establishment of free playgrounds, with paid athletic teachers to teach the young how to amuse themselves. We know that the schools are free, and that they are supplied in many places with free textbooks and with free meals. And we know there are numerous attractive amusements in the city. We know that they are proposing to have a minimum wage of $2.50, even for women and children, and consequently is looked to by the country people as a sort of heaven to which they want to go. Some of us can remember when we worked pretty hard for less than $2 a day. Two dollars a day was the highest I ever received in harvest in southern Minnesota, and I was a pretty husky lad and a good stacker, which was the most difficult job of all. [Applause.]

There must be better farming, better business, and better living. These three are equally necessary, but better business must come first. For farmers the way to better living is cooperation, and what cooperation means is the chief thing the American farmer has to learn.

To ameliorate city life is well, but life in the country must be made equally desirable if it is to successfully compete for population. The new tariff policy, which encourages importations of the food supply from abroad instead of its production at home, will eventually prove a failure as a method of reducing the cost of living. We shall find that we have further accelerated the movement from the country to the city by discouraging our farmers, and food prices will go higher instead of lower, and then what? No doubt many of the people in the cities will begin to say: "Well, if our own people will not cultivate the farms, what is the matter with the industrious Chinese and Japanese? They are good cultivators of the soil, and will work cheap—their standard of living is not high; let us put them to work, and we shall get what we want—cheaper food. We shall lower the cost of living." It is true there is hostility to oriental immigration now, but sentiment often changes. The cry for cheap food, which has transformed the high protectionists in New England and the Eastern States into free traders in agricultural products which they have to buy, may also transform them into advocates of oriental immigration. The promise of cheaper food will appeal to all the people in the congested centers in every part of the country, and it is not at all improbable that they may espouse the policy of unrestricted immigration for that reason. Once that policy is adopted there will begin a gradual transformation of country life in America, and we shall have a system of agriculture mainly carried on by means of oriental labor, incapable of assimilation, and forming a distinct class. If such a thing should come to pass, it would be the end of popular government and democracy. Then it will be time for another Goldsmith to sing of the departed glory of our rural life.

This may be a gloomy foreboding, but that it is not entirely fantastic is evidenced by the fact that it is the chief topic of discussion at the International Congress of Agriculture now in session at Brussels. Here is a clipping from a daily paper:

The former French premier, M. Meline, president of the Tenth International Congress of Agriculture, in his inaugural address yesterday, emphasized the vital importance of preventing the people of the country from migrating into the cities.

He showed by statistics that while the population of the world was increasing, the production of cereals and meat was decreasing. He declared that this was so even in the United States and Canada, on which Europe was accustomed in the past to rely to make up deficiencies. This economic fact, he explained, was the cause of the high cost of living, which tended to become higher more and more rapidly.

My bill is tentative, and only intended as a suggestion. If the idea meets with public favor its details can readily be perfected. Perhaps the work of such an institution might appeal to philanthropists of means who would be willing to endow it; and, if so, the organization could be changed so as to create a corporation as well as a governmental commission. We have a precedent for such a dual organization in the Smithsonian Institution, which is both a governmental agency and a corporation and is supported by both private and public funds.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask for a more complete statement of what this bill contains? I am sure we would like to have at least the main features contained in the bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will now proceed to give a complete statement, and will read most of its provisions:

A bill to create a commission to be known as a country-life institute and defining its duties and powers.

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created to be known as a country-life institute, which shall be composed of five commissioners to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one of whom shall be designated chairman, and the commissioners first appointed shall hold for the terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from July 1, 1914, the term of each to be designated by the President, but successors of said commissioners shall be appointed for six years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of ———. The commission shall have authority to appoint a secretary, who shall receive an annual salary of ———, and a treasurer, who shall receive an annual salary of ———, and employ such other clerical or other assistance as may be found necessary, and to fix the compensation of such employees.

Said commission shall have authority, and it shall be its duty, to institute and carry on a scientific and philosophic inquiry into country life in all its phases, and to report thereon and cause the results of such study and inquiry to be published and disseminated among the people.

Said commission shall include in its inquiry the following subjects:

1. The influence of cooperative methods on the productive and distributive efficiency of rural communities, and on the development of social country life.

2. The systems of rural education, both general and technical, in different countries, and the administrative and financial basis thereof.

3. The relation between the agricultural economy and the cost of food.

4. The changes in the standard and cost of living, and in the economy, solvency, and stability of rural communities.

5. The economic interdependence of the agricultural producer and urban consumer, and the extent and incidence of middle profits in the distribution of farm products.

6. The action taken by different Governments to assist the development and secure the stability of the agricultural population, and the possibilities and dangers of such action with special reference to the delimitation of the respective spheres of State and voluntary effort.

I think that is a very important thing to know, because if the Government undertakes to be a guardian and to manage everything, it will naturally dwarf private enterprise, and it will be a sort of paternalism that can not develop citizens in a free Republic. So there is danger in too much Government assistance.

7. How far rural and agricultural employment can relieve the problems of city unemployment and assist the work of social reclamation.

8. The effect of existing land tenures, speculative holding of agricultural land, and absentee farming has upon agriculture, and whether the stability and progress of country life requires that any of these be modified or abolished, and how.

I have thus outlined the purpose and objects of my bill, principally to stimulate thought and discussion of the subject. And I hope that this subject, which was brought before the American people by President Roosevelt in the report of the Country Life Commission, will meet with a better reception than that did then. It is one of the policies which that great man espoused, and its importance is growing every day. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I print the brief on Schedule I recently submitted by Samuel Ross, of New Bedford, Mass., to the Senate Finance Committee. Mr. Ross is one of our State senators and is just completing 20 years of service in our legislature. He is president of the Mule Spinners' Union, a member of the emergency committee of the United Textile Workers of America, and is one of the recognized labor leaders not only of Massachusetts, but of the United States.

The brief is as follows:

"My message to you is from the workers. I am sent here by the workers in our textile factories, and my expenses are paid by my local union in New Bedford. I have been associated with the labor movement in this country since a young man. I was president of the International Spinners' Union when 22 years of age, and for nearly 20 years its international secretary; a member of the executive committee of the United Textile Workers of America since its inception up to the present time, and also a member of the emergency committee which is composed of five members only. I do not claim to represent all these interests, but I do know something of the feelings of the rank and file of the textile workers, and having talked recently with most of the secretaries of the large cotton workers' unions on the proposed tariff, I am somewhat conversant with the opinion of these men on this subject. I want to say that in our opinion the proposed duties are too low to prevent large importation of competitive products. Only yesterday I met President Golden, of the United Textile Workers' Association, who gave me permission to say for him that he was opposed to any reduction in the tariff that would be injurious to any of our cotton or woolen industries.

"Now, gentlemen, we are convinced that your proposed rates are too low to permit of continued employment, in view of importations that will surely follow the passage of this bill. Let me say here, however, that this does not mean lower wages for us. The large textile unions have declared in their conventions that in view of the high cost of living, wages must not be reduced. That any attempt to lower the wage rate will meet with our most strenuous opposition, so it is not lower wages we fear, but periods of no wages from a reduction of, or cessation of, output.

"We find no fault with revision of the tariff rates. The Democratic Party was elected to reduce the tariff, but I feel sure from the conversations I have had with the people in our mills that they trusted the party not to make such reductions as would tend to further increase the hardships of the workingmen. That this would be the result is proven by the fact that preparations we know are now being made by foreign manufacturers at no little expense to manufacture products for export to this country, which products are similar to those now being made by us. The jubilant spirit with which the cotton schedule has been received in England, by the president of the English manufacturers' association, down to the smallest manufacturer, is very apparent from trade and business conditions in England and the fact that in some cases jobbers and users of yarns from 50s upward are using the argument that in many cases it will be impossible for our manufacturers to quote prices within several cents a pound of that at which the foreign manufacturers can sell. I have in mind a case in my own city of New Bedford, where a mill bought 80s yarns from England in preference to making it themselves, although possessed of the facilities for so doing, when a general reduction of wages of 10 per cent took place, and they then commenced making the yarns themselves. It is only fair to say that this was some years ago and previous to the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

"I am no expert on cost of manufacture or sale of products, and can only speak to you from the employees' standpoint, viewing the situation as an employee would. I desire to impress upon you gentlemen the difficulties under which our industry is laboring at the present time. My local organization, with about 625 pairs of machines requiring the employment of 1,000 men and boys, has paid out in stoppage pay to its members during the past five years from $60,000 to $70,000, and we only pay for the first 13 weeks of stoppage. Stoppage pay is paid to the members of our union due to the stoppage of machinery, because of lack of work.

"As showing the condition of our industry, let me say that our mills in New Bedford, for example, have depreciated in the price of stocks within the last three years some 25 per cent to 50 per cent. Our industry in New Bedford is large and is built up almost wholly within the last 30 years on goods manufactured previously abroad. We have at the present time about 54,000 looms and 3,000,000 spindles. This is more spindles than there are in New England outside of the States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and half as many more than there are in Rhode Island.

"We ask you to consider seriously any proposed schedule that would seriously cripple this industry or the cotton business in general. I ought to add, however, that in New Bedford we are the great fine-goods center of this country. Our mills cost much more to build and equip than similar plants abroad, at least double the cost of English fine mills. Our wages are very much higher—according to the Tariff Board report, at least 75 per cent more than that paid in English mills. You can not afford to reduce our standard of living, and in order to maintain this we must have not only present wages but full continued employment.

"It has been suggested that a ground for determining the prepared tariff rates has been based on the labor cost. For instance, your subcommittee tell me that the value of the finished products made in the cotton mills of the United States are worth $628,000,000, and that the amount paid out in labor for making these products $133,000,000. This is about 20 per cent of the value of the finished product, and you say that you are giving us an average of 20 per cent duties. May I say, gentlemen, that it is unfair to take the average percentage of labor cost to the wholesale value of the finished product for the purpose of basing tariff rates. For instance, in my city, New Bedford, Mass., the wages paid to wholesale value of finished product would be from about 15 per cent to 60 per cent, or even 70 per cent, while the protection you propose would be from 10 per cent on the lower numbers to 25 per cent on the higher numbers. This condition would apply in a greater or lesser degree to the larger textile centers of this country.

"Your subcommittee asked me what rate of tariff duties I would support. I am not an expert on this matter, and can only suggest rates from my knowledge of labor costs in this country and abroad, and also with reference to the importations into this country. I have mentioned above the fact that a mill in the city of New Bedford commenced to manufacture 80 yarns rather than import them, which they had previously done, but only after there had been a reduction of 10 per cent in the wage cost. May I say here that the amount of importations of yarns of this number are greater than the amount manufactured in this country? The tariff duty on these yarns was 35 per cent. I should now suggest, since your subcommittee asked me, that the reduction be not less than 35 per cent on Nos. 90 to 100, not less than 10 per cent from Nos. 1 to 20, and a proportionate advance from Nos. 20 to 90, for each 10 numbers, with a duty of 40 per cent on numbers over 100, and a fair differential of increase for yarns advanced in manufacture beyond single in the gray and for cloths. This advance is about the proportion of advance in these numbers of the labor cost between this country and abroad.

"NEW BEDFORD, MASS., May 23, 1913."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, under authority to extend my remarks in the RECORD, granted in connection with the placing of a certain resolution of the Spokane Chamber of Commerce in the RECORD on May 15, I desire now to add that the said resolutions by the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Spokane, Wash., were made by that body after special study by its committee on military affairs. I believe there is such merit in these findings and conclusions and the subject of adequate military consideration for the Pacific Coast States is so important as to warrant for these resolutions the careful attention of the officers having the matter in charge.

I desire to take advantage of this opportunity to sound a further voice of protest against the discrimination that has heretofore been practiced against the Western States by the Navy Department in the distribution of the ships.

There is a vast coast line out there, extending from the Panama Canal to the Aleutian Islands, constituting the mainland, that demands the constant care of the Navy.

We have in the Pacific Ocean the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and an immense ocean commerce. Diplomatically we are in constant negotiation with the Far East on topics of a more or less delicate nature. There is unrest on every hand.

It is a matter of common knowledge that ever since the Spanish-American War there have been greater chances of war in the Pacific Ocean than in the Atlantic. As the course of empire has taken its course westward, so the possible area of conflict and controversy has gone westward. The Pacific Ocean presents to-day a race problem, the question of commercial supremacy, maritime authority, and naval control.

In the Western States and in Alaska lies practically every acre of the public domain of the United States, its coal and its timber. The Government owns practically all the land in Alaska, and it is now proposed to develop that land and the vast resources of Alaska by a Government railroad. The people of the Pacific coast are just as good people as those of the Atlantic, and they pay their taxes promptly. There is no reason why the fleet should be retained almost entirely in the Atlantic Ocean.

At this time the vessels in the Pacific are entirely inadequate to save the Government from a charge of partiality in the distribution of the fleet. Not a single first-class battleship in the Pacific Ocean. I do not care to say more, as my remarks might be misunderstood just at this time, but I am glad, while the public eye is turned to California and the Pacific coast, to call this matter to the attention of Congress. There is every reason why the Army should be garrisoned mainly in the Western States and a fleet of battleships be maintained in the Pacific Ocean. The people of the Western States demand that consideration.

House joint memorial 1023.

Whereas there is a very strong general sentiment in favor of the suppression of the gigantic monopoly now exercised by the Standard Oil Co. of Whitings, Ind.; and

Whereas the said company has to-day absolute control of the Nation's if not the world's output and supply of crude oil, gasoline, and petroleum, and the said company has unlimited and unrestrained power to dictate the market prices of the said commodities, and by virtue of its unlimited and unrestrained powers does wrongfully and unlawfully and without any justification increase the market and selling prices of said commodities, which results in great injury to the consumers; and

Whereas the said company is wrongfully and unlawfully discriminating against States and selling the said commodities cheaper in some States and localities than others, without regard to the difference of the cost of transportation and selling; and

Whereas by reason of the rapid progress made in motive power the said products—crude oil, gasoline, and petroleum—have become a common necessity in every profession and vocation of life everywhere; and

Whereas the said Standard Oil Co. has absorbed nearly all like competing industries; and

Whereas it is impossible for private capital to cope with or curb this gigantic and unjust monopoly: Therefore be it

Resolved (the senate concurring), That Congress be, and is hereby, requested to enact a law providing for Government ownership and control of oil-producing industries sufficient to control prices and break the gigantic and unjust monopoly now existing; and be it further

Resolved, That the legislatures of all other States of the United States now in session or when next convened be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to join in this request by the adoption of this or an equivalent resolution; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and hereby is, directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to the several Members of said body representing this State therein, and also to transmit copies to the legislatures of all States of the United States.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. ASHURST. From the Committee on Woman Suffrage I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women. I present a report upon this exceedingly important subject, and I ask that the same be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar, and, without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (S. Rept. No. 64) this day submitted by Mr. ASHURST is as follows:

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Woman Suffrage, submitted the following report, to accompany Senate joint resolution 1:

The Senate Committee on Woman Suffrage, having under consideration Senate joint resolution No. 1, introduced by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, to wit:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the provisions of this article."

By direction of a majority of the committee the resolution is reported favorably and with the recommendation that it do pass. The question of granting to women the elective franchise being one of far-reaching consequences and vast importance, involving the political rights of one-half of the citizens of the United States, the committee (notwithstanding the able arguments on this subject and exhaustive reports which have been submitted to Congress from time to time since 1866) took the view that a full and complete hearing should be had; whereupon a number of eminent persons addressed the committee in support of and against the resolution.

PROGRESS.

Observant persons will not fail to notice that marked changes in political and social conditions in the United States are now taking place; that the conditions under which we have been living are rapidly changing, and that many, if not most, of the American people now recognize that society and government are dynamic, not static in character. It is not necessary, in the scope of this report, to discuss all the causes of these changes, but it will not be denied that some of the contributing causes thereof are the adoption of improved means of transportation; the ready communication among the people afforded by the telephone, the telegraph, the post offices, and the excellent facilities for obtaining education and the transmission of intelligence afforded by the schools, the newspapers, and the magazines.

Some statesmen, publicists, and editors deplore the fact that we are now living in an age of inquiry, criticism, and searching analysis, but fortunately the country realizes that smug contentment is a corrosive effluent, deadly to the progress, advancement, and happiness of a nation. A people free from the exigencies of life—free from the desire to bring about a betterment of conditions—lose that keen incentive to improvement which adds so much zest, beauty, and grace to life.

History is largely an account of man's struggle for freedom, and from the beginning of the human race down to the present time its tendency has been toward liberty—mankind reaching out for freedom and immeasurably attaining it.

American civil liberty is the fruitage of many centuries of earnest and patriotic endeavor. The preservation of civil liberty will always depend upon the vigilance and zeal of those who love freedom, and if a people do not love liberty well enough to contend for it, if a people prefer turgid quietude to the boisterousness of liberty, they may be sure that the usurpers of power will sooner or later impose tyrannies and despotism upon them.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

Only a short time since some of the wisest and most profound citizens of this Republic believed that by reason of the complicated procedure and large majorities required it was difficult, if not impossible, to amend the Constitution of the United States, and some eminent statesmen even urged that strained constructions should be placed upon the Constitution so as to change somewhat the structure of our political system, bring it into conformity with the dynamic conditions of the day, and thus secure needful reforms.

Dicey says of amending the Constitution of the United States:

"The sovereign of the United States has been roused to serious action but once during the course of 90 years. It needed the thunder of the Civil War to break his repose, and it may be doubted whether anything short of impending revolution will ever again rouse him to activity. But a monarch who slumbers for years is like a monarch who does not exist."

Speaking in the Senate of the United States on the 5th day of July, 1909, Hon. H. D. Money, who was a close observer of men and events, a statesman whose memory this Nation reveres, a scholar, thinker, and orator, whose services here added glory and usefulness to this body, said:

"Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that there never will be another amendment to the Constitution of the United States. * * * I do not believe this amendment (income-tax amendment) to the Constitution will ever be a part of it." * * *

But contrary to the opinion which a few years since prevailed among many thinking people, within the past five months two amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been proclaimed, and they were adopted under the procedure which is indisputably complicated and involved. The adoption of these amendments, in addition to the valuable reforms they will bring about, has convinced the American people that our Federal Constitution is a living, breathing, dynamic force that protects persons as well as property, and that it is not a Procrustean bed of fixity incapable of amendments or change.

During the Sixty-second Congress, from December 4, 1911, to December 4, 1912, 21 amendments were proposed to the Constitution of the United States, and the feeling that the Constitution may be amended is not confined to any one political party. To this date, during the Sixty-third Congress, 14 proposals to amend the Constitution of the United States have been introduced in the Senate and 32 proposals in the House of Representatives, demonstrating that the "let-alone," noninterference, careless, laissez faire policy does not meet the demand of the present day.

New occasions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth,
They must upward still and onward
Who would keep abreast of truth.
Lo, before us gleam her camp fire;
We ourselves must Pilgrims be,
Launch our Mayflower and steer boldly
Through the desperate winter sea,
Nor attempt the future portals
With the past's blood-rusted key.

But it can not fairly be argued that the proposed constitutional amendment which provides that the rights of citizens of the United States shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State, by reason of sex, is a new, "novel," or "radical" movement, for every phase of this subject has been discussed from time to time by many of the ablest minds of the Nation. It has been considered in its relation to the Constitution, and constitutional law bearing upon such polity has been given earnest and careful consideration.

On July 2, 1776, two days before the Declaration of Independence was signed, New Jersey, in her first State constitution, enfranchised the women by changing the words of her provincial charter from "male freeholders worth £50" to "all inhabitants worth £50," and for 31 years the women of that State voted.

Eighty years ago women could not vote anywhere, except to a very limited extent in Sweden and in a few other places in the Old World.

We do not feel called upon in this report to discuss (if, indeed, it be debatable) the question as to the equality or inequality of the two sexes from an intellectual standpoint. It is, or at least ought to be, an axiom of American liberty that a class of persons obedient to the laws as are the women; a class which has a peculiar care for the rights of others; a class which is taxed upon its labor and property for the support of the Government; which is liable to punishment for acts which the law makes criminal; which is patriotic, learned, and in a large measure capable of the highest degree of efficiency in the useful arts and sciences; which is patient beyond estimate and constantly pouring forth costly sacrifices for the common good of the species, should not be denied a voice in the enactment and enforcement of laws and concerns of the Government.

"Government is simply a tool in the hands of the people for the fashioning of that people's civilization." Government is strong or weak, capable or deficient, according to the people who control and make up that Government. In this Republic the people constitute the Government. They are its creators and its maintenance; they are the Government. That the granting of the elective franchise to women would add to the strength, efficiency, justice, and fairness of government we have not the slightest doubt, and this is especially true in the United States, where all power is reposed in the people with universal suffrage as the primal basis of its exercise. "The people" includes women, who can not be denied those political privileges and responsibilities which men claim and assert for themselves without doing violence to the fundamental principles of our Government.

It is anomalous and archaic, in a free Republic, professedly made up of, controlled by, and administered for all the people, to deny to one-half of its citizens the right of exercising a valuable function of citizenship, to wit, the elective franchise, and thus preclude that one-half from the right and power to say what law or polity shall be its rule of conduct. And this anomaly becomes odious and abhorrent when we reflect that the particular one-half of citizenship thus excluded is the identical one-half from which springs so much wisdom, courage, cheer, hope, and good counsel. In this Republic we are in constant warfare against fraud and violence, avarice, and cupidity, and in behalf of liberty and justice, whose success will be accelerated by extending the franchise to women, in whom the materialistic is generally submerged for the idealistic; a class of voters who look to all laws and movements as to how such laws and movements will affect their children; how such laws and conditions will promote morals, human health, and human progress, more especially than as to how this or that particular law or polity will develop or serve material or property interests. In other words, as has been said, "Man looks after the affairs of life, but woman looks after life itself."

Woman's sphere, her ideals, and her duties make her the inescapable and essential conservator of human life, charged as she is with the duty of conserving the human race; and it is in harmony with political and natural justice to accord to her the right to say what laws shall assist her in bringing about the betterment of economic conditions.

AMERICAN CITIZENS.

This question as to who is an American citizen was left somewhat in doubt by the Constitution of the United States until the adoption of the fourteenth amendment in 1868, when that amendment, in the first section thereof, created a distinct Federal citizenship, as follows:

"ARTICLE XIV.

"SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside." * * *

The rights attaching to an American citizen may be divided into two classes; that is to say, civil rights and political rights. On the ground of public policy minors, incompetents, and others are frequently denied political rights. The right of suffrage—that is, elective franchise, or the right to vote—is a political right which, upon the grounds of sound public policy and a due regard for the genius of our form of government, should never be withheld from a class of citizens fairly and in good faith proved to be worthy of possessing this right. That the class of citizens described in the above resolution (females) has abundantly demonstrated it is eminently worthy of possessing such a right has never been successfully contradicted. In determining whether or not a particular class of citizens is entitled to the elective franchise the following rules, set down by S. E. Forman, Ph. D., in his Advanced Civics (see p. 106), will be found useful, and if a class fairly and in good faith meets the requirements of these conditions it is respectfully submitted that the elective franchise should be granted to such a class. The things to be considered, therefore, are as follows:

1. Will this class of citizens (females) vote whenever the lawful opportunity is presented?
2. Will this class of citizens (females) attempt to comprehend the questions upon which it votes?
3. Will this class of citizens (females) attempt to learn something of the character and fitness of the persons for whom it votes?
4. Will this class vote against dishonest persons for office?
5. Will this class oppose dishonest measures?
6. Will this class refuse, directly or indirectly, to accept a bribe, and refuse, directly or indirectly, to give a bribe?
7. Will this class place country above party?
8. Will this class recognize the result of the election as the will of the people, and therefore as the law?
9. Will this class continue to fight for a righteous, although defeated, cause so long as there is a reasonable hope of success?
10. Is this class of citizens able to read and write?
11. Does this class of citizens pay taxes?

We submit that the class of voters (females) sought to be enfranchised by this resolution answers each and every one of these interrogatories with distinguished credit to itself and that it fully, fairly, and in good faith measures up to these requirements.

We therefore, upon all grounds, conclude that the resolution should be submitted to the States for their adoption or ratification.

Subjoined to this report, and made part thereof, will be found a memorial of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, being Senate Document No. 519, Sixty-first Congress, second session.

[Senate Document No. 519, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, representing the women of the United States desiring the right of suffrage and now being represented in national convention, representing nearly every State in the Union, respectfully demand the recognition by Congress of the right to vote for those women of the United States who possess equal qualifications with men in the matter of intelligence or other conditions imposed by the several States upon the exercise of suffrage.

We ask legislation which will provide that no citizen of the United States be denied or abridged the right of vote by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

We ask that an amendment be submitted to the fifteenth article of the Constitution of the United States, so that it shall read as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE XV.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, sex, or previous condition of servitude."

The reasons for our request are as follows:

(1) The women of the United States are citizens of the United States, entitled by nature to an equal right to enjoy the opportunities of life.
(2) They perform half the work of the United States.
(3) They bear all of the children of the United States.
(4) They educate these children.
(5) They inculcate in these children lessons of morality, of religion, of industry, of civic righteousness, and of civic duty.
(6) They deserve to be honored by the children of the country as entitled to equal dignity and honor possessed by men.
(7) They pay half of the taxes of the United States.
(8) They possess half of the property of the United States, or at least they are entitled to possess half of the property of the United States by virtue of labor performed and duty well done.

Their property and their right to liberty and to life are subject to law. The law controls the property rights of women and the rights of women to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and, therefore, we demand the right to a voice in the election of Representatives to write these statutes and to execute them.

We notify you that the injustice of the past, denying us these obvious rights, will no longer be patiently endured. You can not, in the presence of God and with a clean conscience, deny the validity of the reasons we present justifying our demand.

Answer these arguments.

Answer these sound reasons with a good conscience, and you are compelled to yield to the righteous demand of the women of America.

You well know, as students of history and as students of statecraft, that the ballot is the right protective of every other right, and, knowing this, how will you deny women equal opportunity to earn equal wages for equal labor?

Will you suggest that good women will not vote and bad women will vote? This most untrue and unkind suggestion has been emphatically and finally answered by history, which demonstrates that the same percentage of women vote as men, and that the vote of undesirable women is an utterly negligible quantity. That women are not to be regarded as bringing to suffrage a preponderance of evil, but that their vote has brought to use of the State an important influence in the interest and well-being of children; new and stronger laws for the protection and advancement of the interest of children; new and better laws for the preservation of the public health; new and better laws for decency in administration and the beautifying of cities, and more worthy candidates by all parties are offered where women vote.

We demand the right of suffrage because it is justified by every natural right, because it can not be denied by conscientious, thoughtful, studious men who desire to deal justly with all human beings alike. We desire these rights in order to raise in dignity and power the mothers of this Nation, and for the broader reasons that no nation ever rises higher than the motherhood of the nation, and the welfare of this Nation is not promoted by denying to the mothers of the Nation the elemental right of suffrage which is essential, not only to protect their own rights of life, liberty, property, and pursuit of happiness, but to protect their children, whom they have so loved, from the treacherous pitfalls that line the pathway of life.

Very obediently, yours,

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not. Objection was made to the reference, and the bill is now being read for the first time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will it be in order now to request its reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can not be referred until after it has been read the second time, and objection has been made to its second reading to-day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does that imply that it must go over to another day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It implies that it must go over to another day for its second reading under the rule of the Senate, which requires that on objection a bill shall be read on separate days.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask at whose suggestion the compliance with the rule was required?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the RECORD that it was done at the suggestion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understood that the objection of the Senator from Washington was only to my request that a certain statement be published in the RECORD in connection with the bill. I did not understand that objection was made to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JONES. I simply desire to suggest to the Senator that I am asking that each of these bills shall go through the regular form prescribed by the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Secretary's table will be read by title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, is morning business concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business has not yet been announced as being concluded. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to give notice of a proposed amendment to Rule V, section 2, as follows:

If at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the presiding officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll, or he may count those Senators who are present at the time such question is raised without calling such roll and announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENTS OF LIQUORS (S. DOC. NO. 103).

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I asked at the last session of the Senate for the printing of ex-President Taft's veto message on the so-called Webb-Kenyon liquor bill, together with the opinion of the Attorney General in connection therewith. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] at the time objected, but I think he did not understand that what I desired printed was the President's message, which ought to have been printed in due course without any request.

I renew my request for the printing of the message and the accompanying opinion of the Attorney General, and I hope the Senator from Washington will not object.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say that as that is a message from a President of the United States and should have been printed at the time it was transmitted, but for some reason was not, I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

GOOD ROADS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have a request from the president of the International Good Roads Association to have printed in the RECORD some short comments upon the subject of good roads, and I ask unanimous consent that they be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to make a report of the conference committee on the part of the Senate on House bill 2441, being the sundry civil appropriation bill. This bill has been before the conference committee since the 9th day of May. There is only one difference between the two Houses, and that is practically whether or not there shall be 5 members or 11 members of the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Homes. The bill as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives contained a provision that hereafter when vacancies occur in the board of managers such vacancies shall not be filled until the number of members of the board is reduced from 11 to 5. This provision in the House bill was a plain, simple piece of legislation, having no relation to any appropriation whatsoever. It was a plain change of the statute law of the country, reducing the number of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes from 11 to 5. The Senate did not approve of that piece of legislation in an appropriation bill and amended the bill by striking it out, thus leaving the government of the soldiers' homes in the hands of 11 managers, as now provided by law. That single difference has held up the sundry civil appropriation bill since the 9th of May.

The conferees appointed by the Senate have made every effort which could possibly be made to reach an agreement with the conferees of the House of Representatives. Although our efforts were unsuccessful, we have continued the conferences as far as reason will permit them to be continued. We are informed by the conferees on the part of the other House that they will never accept the amendment made by the Senate. They will not even consider any modification of the position taken by the House in the original bill.

So far as I am concerned, and, as I believe, so far as the other conferees on the part of the Senate are concerned, we have thought, and we still think, that this legislation should not have been embraced in an appropriation bill. We do not think that the government of the soldiers' homes will be improved by reducing the number of the members of the board from 11 to 5. I gravely doubt, Mr. President, whether or not the government of these homes by a board appointed as the board is now being appointed is a wise method of government. I believe—though I perhaps ought not to affirm it, for my investigation has not been exhaustive—I strongly incline to the opinion that the government of the soldiers' homes is not good and that some modification might wisely be made; but when made, it should be made by legislative enactment standing on its own merits and not by a provision injected into an appropriation bill. It is a very bad state of affairs when Senators are confronted with the alternative of accepting a piece of legislation which they do not approve of or defeating an appropriation bill carrying $116,000,000, now badly needed for the conduct of the business of the Government.

I have received letters, Mr. President, from the War Department and from the Treasury Department, stating that the Government is embarrassed for the want of the money carried by this appropriation bill. The amount appropriated is not all available until the 1st of July, but about $14,000,000 intended for river and harbor work was made available at once, because there was immediate necessity for that money; and, in like manner, about $10,000,000 for public buildings was made available at once for a like reason—it was needed immediately. The departments of the Government have been embarrassed for more than a month for the want of this money, and the heads of those departments, as I have said, have been writing letters to me of the most urgent character, stating that the business of the Government has been impeded and embarrassed because the appropriations have not been made.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, we have not been willing to take the responsibility of delaying this appropriation bill any longer. The conferees appointed by the Senate felt that it was incumbent upon them to present the matter to the consideration of the Senate, and I therefore offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2 to the bill H. R. 2441.

If that resolution is adopted, the bill stands passed without further procedure. We have reached no agreement with the House conferees, and can reach none unless we do what this resolution provides shall be done. Instead of agreeing to it ourselves the conferees preferred that the Senate take the responsibility of dealing with this matter. We prefer that the Senate shall say whether we shall recede or whether we shall defeat this appropriation bill and embarrass the Government by insisting upon this amendment.

As unfortunate as the situation is, Mr. President, my judgment is that we had better recede. I do not think that we can afford to withhold these appropriations which are urgently needed at this time and for which the departments of the Government are appealing to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee and the presiding officer of the Senate, asking that there may be some immediate action in order that the Government may be relieved from embarrassment. We can not relieve this embarrassment, Mr. President, except by receding from this amendment, and I think the difference between a governing body of 5 and a governing body of 11 is too small a difference to justify us in proceeding further in our efforts to do what we think is right. I therefore submit the motion to the Senate in order that the Senate may take the responsibility of determining this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2 to House bill 2441.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I fully realize the importance of passing the sundry civil appropriation bill; but I trust this motion will not be adopted. It seems to me the House should recede. In the first place, this appropriation bill as sent to us by the House contains an amendment to substantive law. There may be a strong argument why in a matter pertaining exclusively to an appropriation we should recede upon the insistence of the House, but the proposition presented to us is very different from that. There is a demand that we should, at the dictation of the House, change the law as it has existed since its first enactment, and that, too, not on a bill presented to us in the ordinary way, but as an amendment to an appropriation bill. So it is not for the Senate to recede in such case as this, but for the House.

Again, if there is any one thing upon which the veterans of the Civil War have insisted in the last few years it is the maintenance of the law as it is. They are becoming fewer in number; they are disappearing like the leaves of autumn; many of them find their homes in these soldiers' homes throughout the country, and it is the earnest desire not merely of the occupants of those homes, but of their comrades outside, that there should be one member of the board of managers living near each home. The old soldiers who live in these homes have their wants; they have their complaints, and they desire earnestly the sympathy of a local member of the board who can listen to them and who can know of their needs. So, Mr. President, I think the law should continue as it is. We owe it to the occupants of these homes, and we owe it to the surviving veterans of the Civil War.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I made the motion in the Committee on Appropriations to strike from the House bill the provision under consideration. A majority of the committee voted that it be stricken out. In looking up the history of this matter I find that by the act of March 21, 1866, the membership of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was fixed at 12, namely, the President, the Secretary of War, and the Chief Justice, together with 9 citizens. The President, the Secretary of War, and the Chief Justice are ex officio members during their respective terms of office, but they have never participated in any of the meetings of the board.

The act of March 2, 1887, provided that the number of elected members of the board be increased to 10, and by a joint resolution of March 3, 1891, the number of elected members was increased to 11.

Mr. President, a local manager, as he is called, comes generally from each State in which a branch home is located. The members of the board of managers are not paid a salary. All that the Government does for them is to pay their actual expenses in going to the board meetings or returning from the meetings and in attending to whatever duty they may have to perform within the State to which they are assigned. The provision made in the House bill will involve more expense to the Government than the law as it now is.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if there is anything in the law constituting this board which provides that there must be one member on the board from each State which has a home within its borders?

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President, there is not anything of that kind in the law.

Mr. NORRIS. That is just a custom?

Mr. SMOOT. That is a custom.

Mr. NORRIS. How many soldiers' homes are there, altogether?

Mr. SMOOT. There are 10 or 11, I believe.

Mr. NORRIS. And there are 11 members of the board of managers?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the chairman of the board makes the eleventh.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, is it true that every member of the board comes from a State in which there is a National Soldiers' Home located?

Mr. SMOOT. I so understand, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not looked it up, but I am satisfied the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understand it, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe that is the fact.

Mr. SMOOT. And it was so reported to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator at hand a list of the soldiers' homes?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not a list.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether he has a list of the soldiers' homes?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think I have not a list of the soldiers' homes, but I have a list of the governors of the soldiers' homes, giving their residences.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not expect this matter to be brought to the attention of the Senate to-day or I should have brought the list with me. I have it in my office. If the Senator from Virginia has a list of the home managers, and will read it, of course we can tell whether there are any soldiers' homes in other States than those where the managers live.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator will find that that rule, at least, is not universally applied.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Does this proposed elimination of members eliminate the governor of the soldiers' home at Danville, Ill.?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not tell, because the bill provides that as vacancies occur they shall not be filled; and I really have not here information that will enable me to tell the Senator whether that would be one of the vacancies before the number is reduced to five or not.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have a list which shows the dates of expiration of the various terms.

Mr. SMOOT. That will tell.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If it is desired, the Secretary can read that list.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask that the Secretary read the list, and then the Senator can tell.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that on page 260 of the Congressional Directory, which we all have in our desks, there is a list of the branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and their managers. It is at the foot of page 260.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the Secretary may read the list.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Branches: Central, Dayton, Ohio; Northwestern, Milwaukee, Wis.; Southern, Hampton, Va.; Eastern, Togus, Me.; Western, Leavenworth, Kans.; Marion, Marion, Ind.; Pacific, Santa Monica, Cal.; Danville, Danville, Ill.; Mountain, Johnson City, Tenn.; Battle Mountain Sanitarium, Hot Springs, S. Dak.

Managers: The President of the United States, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of War, ex officiis, Washington, D. C.; Maj. James W. Wadsworth, president, 346 Broadway (New York Life Building), New York, N. Y.—term expires 1916; Lieut. Franklin Murphy (holds over until successor is appointed), first vice president, Newark, N. J.—term expired 1912; Col. Henry H. Markham, second vice president, Pasadena, Cal.—term expires 1916; John M. Holley, Esq., secretary, La Crosse, Wis.—term expires 1916; Maj. William Warner (holds over until successor is appointed), Kansas City, Mo.—term expired 1912; Col. Edwin P. Hammond, La Fayette, Ind.—term expires 1914; Gen. Joseph S. Smith, Bangor, Me.—term expires 1914; Lieut. Oscar M. Gottschall (holds over until successor is appointed), Dayton, Ohio—term expired 1912; Hon. Z D. Massey, Sevierville, Tenn.—term expires 1914; Capt. Lucian S. Lambert, Galesburg, Ill.—term expires 1914; Gen. P. H. Barry, Greeley, Nebr.—term expires 1916.

General treasurer: Maj. Moses Harris.

Inspector general and chief surgeon: Col. James E. Miller.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at the last meeting of the board of managers, without a dissenting vote, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Board of Managers, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, it would not be to the best interests of the members of the home to have the number of managers reduced. The board as now constituted gives to each of the branches of the home a representative on the board. Experience shows that giving to each branch a local manager increases the efficiency of the management and adds to the comfort of the members.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator's idea was—at least, the Senator from Illinois got that idea, I think, from the question he asked—that each member of the board of managers came from a State where there was a home located. A reading of the list of the managers and of the homes shows that that is not true. Those two propositions have no direct connection with each other. A member of the board of managers does not necessarily have to come from a State within whose borders there is a home located, as I suggested awhile ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know that all the testimony which was taken before the committee was to the effect that the reason why they had the local manager was on account of decreasing the expense to the Government, as their traveling expenses would not be so much traveling within the State as they would be if they had to travel out of the State, or through several States.

In that connection the part of the minutes that I have here contains this language:

Experience has shown that this number of members is to the best interest of the home, giving one member for president of the board and to each of the 10 branches a representative on the board known as local manager. These local managers, while taking a lively interest in each of the 10 branches, give particular attention to their respective branches, thus enabling them at the semiannual meeting of the board to make such recommendations and changes in the management of the home as tend to the comfort and happiness of the twenty-odd thousand of members.

I have felt that the conferees on the part of the Senate should insist upon the amendment of the Senate. But from what the members of the conference committee on the part of the House have stated to me I am positive that the statement made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] is correct, that rather than recede they intend that the bill shall fail. I do not want to be one that will cause that to happen, especially for the reason that the department has called attention to the urgent necessity of the passage of this appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator whether it would not be better legislation for the conference committee to report a disagreement and let the two Houses act upon the item in controversy rather than for the House conferees to communicate to an individual Senator what they propose to do?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, only this morning the Senator from Virginia was speaking to me in relation to the question of reporting it in this way, and he decided it was best to bring it directly to the Senate rather than to have a disagreement and report a disagreement. The result, of course, would be the same.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not examined the matter, but it occurs to me that this is a proposal to amend a bill that is in the hands of the conference committee. We have not jurisdiction of that bill at the present time, and, under the rule, I do not think we can take the action that is contemplated.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am sure the slightest examination on the part of the Senator from New Hampshire would satisfy him that he is mistaken about that. It has been done many, many times.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator point out an instance?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It has been done many times. The papers are in the possession of the Senate. They are on my desk. When the Senate recedes from this amendment the bill becomes a law, if the President signs it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator from Virginia the custody of the papers in his individual capacity or as a member of the committee of conference?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have them as the chairman of the conference committee. They are in the custody of the Senate, in a sense. They are in the custody of the Senate's committee now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Are they not equally in the custody of the committee on the part of the House of Representatives?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That I consider entirely immaterial. I dislike to take the time of the Senate, but there are many, many precedents justifying this course.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will not ask the Senator to take the time of the Senate to read the precedents. I presume there are precedents on both sides, as usual.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have them right before me. I do not think there can be found a precedent that raises a doubt about the validity of the action which I propose.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that when a bill is sent to a conference committee it is in the custody of that committee, and that it is not competent for an individual member of the committee to bring the papers before either body and ask that the body shall recede from any action it has taken. If the precedents are all the other way, then I feel very much like Speaker Reed felt when he ruled a Member of the House out of order, and the Member next day called his attention to the fact that according to Reed's Rules the Member was in order; and the Speaker said: "Well, the book is wrong." I am still of opinion that when a bill is in the custody of a conference committee it is not competent for an individual member of that committee to bring it before the body with a view of amending it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator whether the provision of the bill under dispute involves any change in existing law?

Mr. SMOOT. It does involve a change in existing law.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As such I believe it is subject to objection under the rules of both Houses.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not subject to an objection here, because the Senate has stricken out the provision of the House. It was subject to a point of order in the House, but the point was not made there. The Senate struck out the provision inserted by the House in the appropriation bill, and left the appropriation bill without the proposed amendment to the present law.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And left the existing law as it is?

Mr. SMOOT. And left the existing law as it is.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he now understands, in view of the observations of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that if the modification suggested by the House shall obtain that would eliminate the officers now in command or control at Danville, Ill.; or could it, in its ordinary operation, produce that effect?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not follow the time of expiration of the terms by States; but if the Senator will turn to page 260 of the Congressional Directory, he will find there the date of the expiration of that officer's term; and if the expiration of his term comes before the reduction, as they stand to-day, of the 11 members to 5, then, of course, he would be affected. On the other hand, if it does not, he would not be.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Utah, in relation to the answer he has just given to the Senator from Illinois, whether it is not true that each one of these soldiers' homes has a governor outside and distinctly independent of the board of managers?

Mr. SMOOT. Each one of them has a local manager.

Mr. NORRIS. He is called the governor, is he not?

Mr. SMOOT. And the local manager is a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home. That is the office I have been discussing.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator certainly is mistaken about that. I thought his mind was cleared on that point when he read from the record that the State in which the home was located did not necessarily have to have a member of the board of managers. Besides the board of managers, as I understand—and I should like to be corrected if I am wrong—there is a local governor of the home. Referring particularly to the home at Danville, Ill., there is a governor of that home, and he is not a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home. If we should take them all away, it would not affect the particular officer about whom the Senator from Illinois has inquired of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand that the governor to whom the Senator refers is not involved in this proposition. He may be the governor, but I am speaking now of the local manager; and all the local managers, 10 in number, are also members of the Board of Managers of the National Home.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I have here the minutes of the meeting, and also a statement made by one of the managers of the home, and it——

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator will permit me, each soldiers' home has a superintendent.

Mr. SMOOT. He is designated the governor.

Mr. BURTON. Or governor; I do not know by what name he is called.

Mr. SMOOT. I may be mistaken in his exact designation.

Mr. NORRIS. He is not a member of the board of managers.

Mr. SMOOT. No; and he is not involved in this question at all.

Mr. NORRIS. The man at Danville now is not at all involved in this proposition.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator from Illinois a question. Is there a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home from Illinois?

Mr. LEWIS. I would rather yield to my colleague, who is more familiar with the details of the matter than I am. I can not answer that question.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a member of the board of managers from Illinois at the Danville home. There are several gentlemen scattered about over the country who are members of that board. It has been my pleasure to transact business not only with that board of managers, but with nearly every one in the United States within the last four or five years. There is uniformly a board of managers, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, that is local to each one of these branches of the home, located at different points in the United States. Out on the coast, in California, there is one. There is one in Wisconsin, at Milwaukee, or in the vicinity; and there are others at different points. These managers are merely a local board; and they have under them, acting as the executive officer of the home, a governor or superintendent of that home in each place where one is situated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Illinois, I will state that I notice in the record that Capt. Lucian S. Lambert, of Galesburg, Ill., is a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home. Therefore he is involved in this question.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I beg to disagree with him. The Senator from Illinois inquired about the governor at Danville, Ill., and when I interrupted the Senator awhile ago I wanted to call attention to the fact that the governor or superintendent, or whatever the official title may be, at Danville, Ill., is in no way involved in the question now before the Senate. Capt. Lucian S. Lambert, of Galesburg, Ill., is a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home, and he has just as much authority in regard to the home in California as the home in Illinois. He does not live at Danville, and he has no control over that home except as a member of the board of managers, that board having control over all the homes.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a minute. I will then gladly yield to the Senator.

The Senator from Nebraska is wrong, because the fact is that Mr. Lucian S. Lambert is not only a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home but he is the local manager, and it is his particular work to look after the interests of the home in Illinois.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Utah now yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Utah is mistaken. There is no such thing as a local manager. The managers may be appointed from anywhere, as I understand the law, and they may be assigned to any one of the homes thought desirable. Therefore it is not at all proper to say that they are local managers. Each home has a governor, who is local to that particular soldiers' home, but it is not so with respect to the managers at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all I am doing is to give the history exactly as it has been given to me. The Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers consists of 11 members. There is 1 of those 11 who is president of the board, and the other 10, by the action of the board, are designated to certain homes. The home in Illinois is presided over, as far as the board of managers are concerned, locally by the member designated by the board of managers of the national home as the local manager.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me there?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. That is Capt. Lucian S. Lambert, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. He lives at Galesburg, does he not?

Mr. SMOOT. He does.

Mr. NORRIS. The home is located at Danville.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Does he draw a salary?

Mr. SMOOT. He does not.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator wish the Senate to understand that the gentleman who has charge of the home at Danville, Ill., manages it and performs all the duty without a salary?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not. There is a governor or superintendent who gives his personal attention to the detail work of the home, but the Board of Managers of the National Home designated Capt. Lambert as the local manager representing that board, and that is what he does.

Mr. NORRIS. They might send him there.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a question of sending him there. He is designated.

Mr. NORRIS. What does his designation mean?

Mr. SMOOT. His designation means that he shall look after the interests of the home as the representative of the board of managers.

Mr. NORRIS. What authority has he? Has he any other authority except that which the board give him? And have they not the same right to give him the same authority over any other home in the country if they want to do so?

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody has stated that they could not assign him to any other home. The only authority he has he gets from the board of managers itself.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator which one of the board of managers runs the home in Virginia? Will the Senator give me that information? And while he is getting that, it may be that he can give me the name of the man who runs the soldiers' home in South Dakota; and while he is looking for South Dakota he might think about Kansas, too, and tell us who is running the Kansas institution.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what the Senator means as to running—whether he means the superintendent——

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator to say that one member of the home is designated to take exclusive charge of one home.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that he had charge; I said that he would look after the interests of the home.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator did not use that language, but I have used language of the same import; and if he does not mind I wish he would tell us now what he does mean.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know that it is necessary to repeat; but I will say that there is a Board of Managers of the National Home consisting of 11, and that those 11 members designate one of the board to supervise, as it were, a particular home; and his special work as a member of the board of managers is to look after the interests of the home to which he is designated.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator tell us which one supervises and looks after the home in Virginia and the one in Kansas and the one in South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the list.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has the list in his hand right there; his fingers are on it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that I can give it from the Congressional Directory quicker than to hunt anyone out. Lieut. Franklin Murphy would look after the home in New Jersey; I do not mean as superintendent, but he is designated by the board of managers as local manager.

Mr. GALLINGER. To visit it.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is no home in New Jersey, he is designated to some other State that has one.

Mr. NORRIS. I asked the Senator a particular question in regard to three separate homes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then in Kansas City, Mo., there is a home, and William Warner is designated as local manager of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not ask the Senator about that.

Mr. SMOOT. He is the local manager representing the board of managers at that home.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Utah will have to guess again. There is no home at Kansas City, Mo.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not mean at Kansas City. I meant the home in Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Kansas City, Mo., is in Missouri, and there is no home in Missouri that I know of.

Mr. SMOOT. Is there not one in Leavenworth?

Mr. BRISTOW. In Leavenworth, Kans., and Leavenworth, Kans., is a different city from Kansas City, Mo.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator who is designated by the board to look after the home in Kansas. I should like to have him give the name.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand, of course——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is killing a great deal of very valuable time. There is no such thing as a Federal soldiers' home in Missouri. There are two State soldiers' homes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not yet said that the members of the Board of Managers of the National Home are appointed to the home of the State that they live in, but they are appointed to represent some particular State. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if there is any such officer as superintendent of the soldiers' home.

Mr. SMOOT. I think he is designated governor.

Mr. WORKS. Of course.

Mr. ROOT. May I make a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. I think this board of managers is practically a legislative body for the soldiers's home in its various branches, and one member is made practically a subcommittee of the board to look after the affairs of the home which happens to be most convenient to his residence. It may be in the same State where he lives or in a neighboring State. Each home has its management complete, its governor, its executive force, and the supervising body of all is the board of management, who may appoint subcommittees.

Mr. WORKS rose.

Mr. ROOT. Let me say one word further while I am up. I think the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] is right, and I hope his motion will prevail, for from some knowledge gained officially years ago of the working of this system and from what I understand to be the opinion of Mr. Wadsworth, the president of the board, I think we would have better administration with a board of 5 than with a board of 11. Better administration, after all, is what we want to accomplish, and that, after all, is what is for the benefit of the great body of old veterans who are in these homes; and because I think that would be the result I am in favor of the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I do not believe that the result would be the better management of the homes, but, as I said before, rather than see the great civil sundry appropriation bill fail I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, as I understand it, the question involved here is a change in existing law by means of an appropriation bill, a practice which is denounced by the rules of both Houses. The last House determined to relax that rule and to carry through matters of general legislation upon appropriation bills, and insisted upon such legislation, notwithstanding the protest of the Senate; and this practice is repeated at this session in the reenactment of the sundry civil bill, which was vetoed at the last session.

I think the practice of general legislation upon an appropriation bill is bad, and that is the judgment of both the Senate and the House, as expressed by their rules. We had a realization of the evil of this practice during the last Congress when, without consulting the proper committees, without debate involving the special subject, the House sought, through the action of an Appropriation Committee, to put upon the bills legislation of a general character and of the highest importance; and there was hardly a case where this legislation was not, in my judgment, ill-considered and prejudicial.

I recall that one amendment was offered which would have demoralized the entire civil service of the District of Columbia, practically bringing to a termination the official lives of all the clerks employed in the District of Columbia at the end of five years and submitting them to all the uncertainties and harassments incident to temporary employment, and also subjecting the Government, in my judgment, to the inconvenience of an ill-trained body of public servants. Fortunately that amendment was beaten finally by the veto of the President, if my memory serves me right.

Another amendment provided for the absolute abolition of competition in architecture under the noted Tarsney Act, a bill introduced by a Democrat and put through by a Democratic Congress, an act which has been of the highest service to the country, insuring the enlistment of the highest artistic and architectural capacity in the service of the Nation through a competitive test. That amendment was forced through against the protest of the Senate, without the consideration of the proper committees either in the Senate or the House, and by mere tenacity of purpose and resoluteness of will upon the part of the House managers.

And now to-day we have another change in existing law about to be forced upon us by the House. One would think that when the Senate managers object to such a change and insist upon its being made through the usual forms of law the House, obedient to its own rules and to the established procedure of legislative bodies, would recede from its indefensible position. But we are told by the managers upon the part of the Senate that the House insists, and that the bill will fail unless the Senate yields to this departure from well-established legislative procedure. We are called upon to consent to revolution in our legislative methods, and we are not only called upon to consent but we are forced to consent.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. With the permission of the Senator from Nevada, although it is not at all conclusive of the question, I think it is just to say that the House conferees rest their position largely on the fact that this provision was agreed to by both Houses of Congress at the last session. They contend that the two Houses reached an agreement; that not only the conference committee agreed to it but that the House adopted the report of the conference committee. They feel that they ought not to be required to change now. I say that not because I think it is conclusive, for the matter is still open; it is not the law, but it is for the two Houses to determine whether it shall be the law.

I felt in justice to the situation presented that I should state to the Senate that the House conferees rested largely on the fact that the two Houses once agreed to the provision which they now insist upon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. My answer is, Mr. President, if the two Houses agreed it was because the House persisted to the end in revolutionary methods. There must be an end to patience, in my judgment, and the Senate should stand not only for its own dignity, but for the verity and the correctness of legislative procedure.

Mr. President, where will this end? If the Senate yields once and yields twice and yields thrice and always yields we will have a revolutionary body in the House composed of the Appropriation Committee, which with the consent of that body will do the legislation for every committee in both bodies, which will initiate general legislation upon appropriation bills, which will initiate changes in existing law and carry them through the House, and then by fixity of purpose and pertinacity force their will through the Senate.

I believe this practice is a vicious one, and I believe it is time for the Senate to take a stand.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to pass to a matter personal to myself and to make a personal statement regarding the position which I took in a speech on the 16th of May last regarding the sugar and the wool schedules of the tariff.

[The further remarks of Mr. NEWLANDS, with insertions and appendices, are printed in the Appendix.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, possibly the effect of the amendment made to the existing method of management is misapprehended. The present method of managing the homes maintained by the Government is through a superintendent or commandant. He is the executive officer representing the board of managers at that particular home. He exercises all of the executive and managerial power that is vested in any public officer, as a matter of fact. Whatever the legal theory may be under which he is appointed or exercises the power of his office he is the actual executive on the ground administering the affairs of that particular institution. He is appointed in the first instance nominally and in many instances really by the board of managers.

The board of managers consists of 11 men, appointed from various parts of the country, together with the ex officio members of the board of managers, the President of the United States, the Chief Justice, and the Secretary of War. Of the 11 members appointed, outside of those designated, there are 3 of them whose terms expired in 1912. These, I think, without exception, hold over. No reappointments have been made, so far as I can find. Four of them have terms expiring in 1914 and four of them in 1916.

The provision of the House proposing the reduction of the actual membership of the board from 11 to 5 does not produce either economy or efficiency. It does not produce economy because the reduction of the board from 11 to 5 does not dispense with the performance of any duty. It does not reduce the compensation paid by a single dollar.

These homes range territorially from California to Maine, from South Dakota, I believe, to Virginia. In the Mississippi Valley they run from Leavenworth, Kans., to Marion, Ind. Those 11 men, as a matter of fact, do not exercise managerial or executive power in the management of these institutions. They exercise technically supervisory power. Their proper legal function, Mr. President, their actual power, is more that of a visitorial committee. However it may be regarded from the real point of view as to whether this is a charity or not, not only the theory of the law but the idea on which appropriations are made and expended is that this is a governmental charity.

I have not thought that in legislation that was a proper way to designate it. I have always felt in justice to those receiving relief that some explanation should be made. It is more properly the payment of a preexisting debt, but in the classification by the acts of Congress those institutions are regarded as great public charities. Eleven of them are maintained by the Government under appropriations.

If these be taken in their legal signification as public charities, Mr. President, the board of managers actually exercise no power save that of visitation. The visitorial powers of the 11 men are for the purpose of keeping the charity within the purposes of the founder. The founder in this instance is the Government. The object of this visitation is to keep not only the expenditures within bounds for the purposes for which the appropriation is made, but to keep the executive or managerial officer at the head of the institution in the constant and faithful discharge of his duties in order that the purposes of the founder of the charity may be effectually accomplished.

There will be no economy in the exercise of the reduction proposed by the House, because reducing the number to five will not reduce the duties to be performed. The five men remaining, when they shall have accomplished its purpose, must cover the territory and perform the supervisory and visitorial powers from California to Maine and from the Dakotas to Virginia. It will not reduce their expenses because no salary is paid. It is purely a labor in which the duty done is the sole compensation for the person performing it.

When the expenses of the visitorial committee—and that is what this is, as a matter of fact—have been discharged, the sole purpose of their creation is ended. All they have is their traveling expenses. Beyond that there is not a dollar from the Government when the visitation is performed by the five men, the number which this reduction proposes. When that has been fully performed by the five men, their expenses in traversing the territory covered by the homes and in the performance of their duty will equal now the expenses, with but very little difference, if any, of the 11 men now provided by the act of Congress. The governors of the homes are appointed by the board of managers. Ordinarily if any suggestion is made by the Chief Executive, who is responsible not only for the proper appropriation but for the administration of the funds, it is heeded. It is very similar to the appointment of like boards inside the State governments; when the managerial officer is appointed he only executes the general policy in the outline given him by the appointing power. In every instance, however, the commandant or superintendent on the ground is the responsible officer administering the affairs of the institution, expending the money, as a matter of fact. Under his direction the bills are verified and audited and the care of the inmates is had pursuant to the appropriation. The board seldom goes back of the recommendation of the managing officer.

Now, there will be no economy, because the 5 men must perform the duties of 11.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois whether the board of managers has headquarters anywhere?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know. I never have been able to locate them when I wished to reach them.

Mr. WORKS. Is it not a fact that they sometimes gather together and have a meeting of some sort?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I think they do; but I do not know where.

Mr. WORKS. Then, I suppose 11 of them would have to travel to that meeting, wherever it might be held. And does the Senator not think it would cost a little more for 11 of them than for 5 to travel to headquarters to hold their meetings?

Mr. SHERMAN. It would cost about 2 cents a mile.

Mr. WORKS. I am quite sure that the member of the board from California goes to New York once in a while to meet with the board of managers.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. And I know by experience that it costs something to travel from California to New York and return.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does under existing conditions. Let me reply further to the suggestion of the Senator from California, which is a practical and sensible one, that when the number of managers is reduced to five all of them would not be in or near New York City or the State of New York, but one is just as apt to be in California and another in Washington as to be adjacent to or within a day's travel of the branch homes.

So far as mileage may be involved in the supposed economy, with the reduction of the number of the board of managers to five, as much travel will be necessary for one man, if he chances to live in Oregon or California, to attend the meetings of the board in St. Louis or New York as is the case now, although there might be less travel by 5 men than by 11. Where the meetings of the board of managers may hereafter be held would determine the question whether the mileage would be greater or less under the change than under the existing plan. I do not think anybody can successfully say that there will be economy in the traveling expenses of the board unless he knows where the board as hereafter constituted will have its place of residence and further where it will hold its meetings when organized.

I think universal experience argues against the proposition that efficiency is promoted by consolidating or by reducing the number of such a body. If there was anything in the argument that efficiency would thereby be promoted I would gladly vote for the proposed change. The question of efficiency, however, when the number is reduced from 11 to 5 could not be established by any known process of reasoning. Diverse managements consolidated increase efficiency. This is not what is proposed in this amendment, however. Eleven men now exercise supervision over 10 institutions. Five men under the proposed change will be required to cover the same institutions, which are scattered in various parts of the country. Those 5 men must exercise the visitorial powers now exercised by 11.

In every instance where boards exercising supervision of public charities having enlarged powers and some authority in the actual administration of the institution have been consolidated and their membership reduced it has been found necessary to supplement them by auxiliary boards of visitors to discharge the visitorial duties which a consolidated board, with a lesser number, has been found incapable of discharging, in view of the time they can afford to give without compensation to the performance of that duty.

I do not know of an instance of a board charged with the supervision of a State charity being reduced from a larger number of men to a smaller number of men, working without compensation, where the effective visitation of the charity has not been compelled to be performed by the creation of an auxiliary board, either local or general, to perform some of the visitorial functions formerly performed by the larger body.

There is no limitation as a matter of law from what section of the country the 11 members constituting the present board may be selected, but, if my memory is not wrong, 7 of them at least are appointed from States in which the Government has located branch homes; 3 are appointed from States in which no home is located, and 1 of them, Maj. Warner, of Missouri, is appointed for and acts in the capacity of local member of the board for the home in Leavenworth, Kans., which is a short distance from his home. As a matter of fact, the most effective supervision can be given by some one who does not find it necessary to travel across the continent in order to reach the institution of which he has supervision. A man within a day's travel can reach the institution more readily and give better service than one who has to travel clear across the continent. Prudence as well as an efficient management of the institution would dictate that some member of the board should live near by.

Mr. President, it seems to be the prevailing thought here that if the board should be reduced from 11 to 5 greater efficiency will be produced. I have not a particle of interest in these matters, for I do not expect as a member of the minority party to be consulted concerning such an appointment within the next four or five years; and I feel greatly relieved thereat. I have no purpose in view other than the efficient administration of the 10 branch homes in which are gathered a large number of the surviving veterans of the Civil War who find it necessary to receive care in that way.

For over four years I was connected in a managerial and executive way with institutions of this character. We had more than 20,000 of the unfortunate wards of the State in our care, with 2,600 employees on the pay roll, and administered over $5,000,000 annually for their care. A single board possessed executive and managerial power over all those institutions; but with the added burden laid upon the board, with its concentrated and extensive power, in addition to the power given the superintendent or executive on the ground of the institution, we found it indispensable in the discharge of the visitorial powers that were necessary to be exercised at least once every 30 days for the efficient management and for the execution of the purpose of the charity to create auxiliary boards of visitation that would more fully supplement our visitation in order more thoroughly to carry out the purposes of the law. Some of such boards were local, some of them were district, and some of them State wide; but all of these visitorial powers could not in the nature of things be fully exercised by a body of five men serving without pay.

I do not say that everybody works exclusively for salary. There are Members of the Senate who have performed, with utterly inadequate or with no compensation, great public services beyond price, and whose value to the Government is incapable of computation in money, but those instances are few. In some far-distant age we shall reach a time when we shall all be philanthropists and will work for the public for nothing, but as it is we have got to take human nature as we find it. If you select five men for members of the board of managers and require them to cover an area that reaches from shore to shore, asking them to give up their time and return to them nothing but their traveling expenses, you will not get as good visitation and you will not have the charity founded by the Government as well cared for as you will if you have 11 men who will necessarily perform the service in a more subdivided and general way. The burden will not be as heavy on them as it would be on 5.

It is not a question of economy at all; it is a question of efficiency. The reduction of the number is a reduction of the efficiency. Efficiency would be conserved by retaining the 11 men. I understand it carries in the neighborhood of $4,000,000 for the maintenance of the homes.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. I hardly ask the Senator to yield for the purpose of asking a question or questioning what he has said, only I understood the Senator to say that he did not know that the section of the country from which the managers are appointed was in any way limited or restricted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. I simply call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the provision found in the act approved March 2, 1887. By this act the number of managers was increased from 9 to 10, and there is a provision in the act that—

One of whom shall be a resident of a State or Territory west of the Rocky Mountains.

That is the only limitation which I have found. There is a subsequent act, which reads——

Mr. SHERMAN. May I inquire, for information, to what institution that refers?

Mr. STERLING. It refers to the soldiers' home in California. The section provides for the appointment of an additional manager—William Blanding, of San Francisco, Cal.—and then provides, in general terms, that one of the board shall be a resident of a State or Territory west of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not care to say much more on this subject. There has been some criticism of this method of amending a law that is not concerned in the bill which seeks to amend it save as it provides money for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of that law. Generally the right way to amend a law is by a bill that does so in express terms and not in an indirect and evasive way. It has not been many weeks since I heard criticisms on the side of this Chamber where I belong for the present in regard to the method of amending a general law by riders in an appropriation bill. Those criticisms appealed to me; they always have. I think the courageous, the honest, way to legislate is by your bill to go directly to the point to be reached. This is a method of monetary coercion. It is said to us in substance, "We do not care what your views may be or what you may think of the merits of the law as it now is, but if you do not concur with us in amending the law we will deprive you of the money which maintains the institutions affected; agree with us or we will take away the means whereby these institutions may be maintained."

In the stress of political emergency, in the warfare in which everything is supposed to be fair, where even the Constitution is not permitted to stand "between friends," I can understand that any means are regarded as justifiable that will reduce the enemy to a state of insensibilty or inaction, but I can not understand why this method of monetary strangulation should be adopted here in connection with a great public charity maintained by the Government for those who saved it in its hour of peril.

It may not be material; I do not know. Perhaps these homes may be just as well administered under 5 as under 11 managers; but if you want to amend the law, amend it directly and do not undertake to amend it by this indirect method of cutting off the means of subsistence. That may not be done; one House or the other may recede; that is true; but suppose that does not happen. If the two coordinate branches do not agree, what is the necessary effect? I prefer to measure things by their necessary effect. The effect of this would be, if the Senate adheres to its amendment and the House adheres to the provision it wrote in the bill, which amends the general law governing this charity, that there could be nothing whatever but a legislative deadlock and the failure of the bill. So the motive that lies back of the legislative mind, the proposition of the men who wrote that into the bill, is, in effect, "Agree with us or we will kill your charity by withholding the money for its maintenance." If you will bring up the question of amending the act by which these great institutions were founded by the Government and present clearly the question of whether a reduction shall be had in the number of the board of managers from 11 to 5, then we can meet it on a different ground.

I do not care to wander very far afield here. I understand that under the present rules of the Senate I can read anything, Mr. President, from a Talmud to the last Democratic platform, if I so desire. I may never have an opportunity to do so, because I understand there is on the calendar a proposed amendment to one of our rules that will prevent these pleasing excursions far afield, and that hereafter we will have to stick to the text, and, like a good minister in a country congregation, when we wander from it we shall do so at the peril of losing a congregation or of receiving the censure of the Senate for departing from the rules.

In reference to the matter which we are called on to decide, it occurs to me, Mr. President, that we ought to stick to the law as it now is. These 11 men serve without pay. Their traveling expenses are the sole charge on the Government Treasury. I do not know what their traveling expenses are. I know if they audit the traveling expenses of the Federal officers as they audit my expenses, no official can put anything in his account that ought not to be there. I know we pay our own porters; I know we pay our own waiters; I know the Government reduces us down to the skeleton and the running gear of a traveling man's expenses. I do not know what the Government does in this case, but I apprehend that there is nothing in the way of fancy frills when you come to charge up your expense account.

If that is so, what does this amount to? A few thousand dollars at best. If a report could be had of the traveling expenses of the members of the board for the last year, it would be very trivial. The time consumed by my genial friend, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and others here this afternoon, if we could put it on a cash basis of what such ability and genius is worth, would far exceed in value the allowance for the traveling expenses for an entire year of these gentlemen who are to be deprived of their offices. There is one gentleman on the list from my State, I believe—Dr. Lambert. I can say with entire confidence, Mr. President, regarding ourselves now as in executive session, and not to be repeated to the profane ear of the general public, that he has not, I believe, been affiliated with the element of my party with which I have had the fortune or misfortune to be identified for many years in that State. He and I likely have no particular political affinity, to put it in as mild terms as I possibly can. I am not acting here solely to try to prolong his official existence. There is not a trace of selfishness in this. I approach the consideration of the matter in a judicial aspect, as far as is possible in this body. I am quite sure that with him on the board as a member, performing visitorial functions, there will be an efficient, full discharge of that duty. He is a competent man; he stands well in his profession. He never fails in his duty.

The same thing may be said of the member of the board from Missouri, who, I understand, performs official duties at Leavenworth, Kans. These 11 men, whatever they may perform in the way of actual duty, get nothing under the sun but the approval of their own consciences.

There is another thing: The more numerous you have a committee charged with the powers of visitation, where they are men of the proper kind, the more thoroughly the duty of visitation will be performed. The object of a visitation from the days when the law was laid down by the Crown lawyers in the mother country, when the right of visitation was retained by the founder of a private charity or by the Crown in a public charity, was to hold those who discharged their duty and expended the money strictly within the line of the charity and to see that the beneficiaries of the charity received full measure for the money expended.

If there is efficiency in reducing the number of nonsalaried members of a visitorial committee, then reduce the membership to one. One man can do the work as well as 11; 1 man can do it as well as 5; and if there is merit in this idea of consolidation and reduction of numbers one can do the work more expeditiously. He can agree with himself most of the time. There will be no discussion, no loss of time in debating questions. There can be instant executive action. But it is an impossibility for one man—and that is what the wisdom of the ages has told us—ever to be an efficient visitorial body. It takes more than one man in order to correct the inefficienices of another; and in this combination of men a numerous visitorial body is the one that in every instance has produced the most efficient results.

I do not know that these powers of visitation could be adequately exercised by five men. It can not be done in smaller jurisdictions. It has been found by experience, it has been worked out and tried, not upon the theories of those who have sat down in a committee room and framed things on paper, but by those who have actually administered these charities in the field. In order to make them efficient these boards that have been auxiliary for visitation purposes have been established to supplement the efforts of the main body. If this change is once introduced into the code of laws governing the Government charities, it will remain in that way. Whatever injury may result from a lack of efficient supervision and visitation will have been accomplished.

I hope that this change in the law that is contemplated by the House and that has been stricken out by the Senate will remain stricken out, and that the Senate will adhere to the amendment made in this body and seek to induce the House to recede from the obnoxious provision that is there introduced.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the mere fact that a large property and some announced political interest is situated in the State which I have the honor to represent, together with my colleague, justifies the moment that I will occupy upon this subject.

I think parliamentary history reminds us in somewhat facetious tone that when Edmund Burke was making his contest for the seat at Bristol he was accompanied by his colleague, a Mr. Barksdale; and, after having made a most eminent and excellent presentation of his position, Mr. Burke concluding the oration, Mr. Barksdale rose and, conscious he could add nothing that would illuminate the subject, said, "I say ditto to Mr. Burke."

I am content, after hearing the splendid argument of my colleague and the reasons advanced by him, to add my approval to his observations and say "ditto" to my distinguished colleague, and give my approval and support to the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, in my judgment the two Houses of Congress have been differing for some weeks or months about a matter of very little consequence. I do not think it makes very much difference whether this board of managers consists of 5 members or of 11. As the Senator from Illinois has said, it will make very little difference so far as the matter of expense is concerned.

If I had my way about it there would not be any board of managers. They have never amounted to very much, anyhow. We know something about that out in California. The conditions in the Pacific Home were such that I thought it my duty to call upon the Senate to order an investigation of the conditions in that home. That was done, and a very careful and thorough investigation was made of the home by a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs. It showed a very deplorable condition of things. The old men in that home who were practically—whatever we may call it—objects of charity had been sorely neglected. They had their local manager living at Pasadena, near by; but for some reason their comfort was not properly looked after. I do not know who should be held responsible for it, but the fact existed and was clearly demonstrated by the investigation I have mentioned. As a result of that condition of things a bill was introduced at the last session by one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, proposing to transfer this home to the War Department, where, in my judgment, all of them should be.

I should much rather see an amendment, if any is to be made here at all, abolishing the board of managers entirely and transferring the management and control of these homes to the War Department, where I believe these old men would be better cared for than they are now.

So far as this particular question is concerned, I think it is a matter of very little consequence, as I said in the beginning; but I hope Congress will yet reach such an understanding of the conditions existing that it will transfer all of these homes to the War Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2 to House bill 2441.

Mr. BURTON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Virginia made the explanation. Do I understand that it is proposed to recede from the Senate amendment, and that the House provision, reducing the number of members of the board of managers from 11 to 5, will stand if the motion of the Senator from Virginia prevails?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is correct. I make the motion for the reason that we are holding up appropriations to the amount of $116,000,000, that the departments of the Government insist they need daily, and that the public service is being injured by the delay, all owing to the simple difference between 5 managers and 11 managers of these homes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], who is absent from the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]; but believing for good reason that he would vote just as I shall on this question, I will take the liberty of voting. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and will vote. I vote "nay."

So the motion of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate having receded from amendment No. 2 to House bill No. 2441, the bill stands passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up House bill 1917, the Indian appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1917) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the committee may be acted upon as they are reached in the reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, on page 2, line 9, after the word "law," to strike out "$220,000" and insert "$200,000," so as to read:

For the survey, resurvey, classification, appraisement, and allotment of lands in severalty under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," and under any other act or acts providing for the survey and allotment of lands in severalty to Indians; and for the survey and subdivision of Indian reservations and lands to be allotted to Indians under authority of law, $200,000, to be repaid proportionately out of any Indian moneys held in trust or otherwise by the United States and available by law for such reimbursable purpose and to remain available until expended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. LANE. There is a matter concerning this which I should like to have explained. I am not familiar with the procedure here as to the way the bill is to be considered. Is each clause to be considered by itself?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is now being read for action on the amendments of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will inquire if the proposed amendment of the committee has been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment has been read. The Chair was inquiring whether there was any objection to the amendment. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. LANE. To what amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To the amendment on page 2, line 9.

Mr. LANE. The amendment reducing the appropriation from $220,000 to $200,000?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment.

[Mr. LANE addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Lewis	Sherman
Bacon	Gore	McCumber	Shively
Bankhead	Gronna	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Hitchcock	Myers	Smoot

Catron	James	Page	Thompson

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] from the Chamber on account of illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STONE. It is growing late, and I wish to ask unanimous consent that the bill before the Senate be made the unfinished business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It becomes that on the adjournment.

Mr. STONE. If that is the case——

Mr. SMOOT. Automatically, under the rules.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will be the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be the unfinished business on adjournment.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next at 12 o'clock m.

The motion was agreed to.

RECEPTION OF HON. LAURO MULLER.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, Dr. Lauro Muller, the secretary of state of the Republic of the United States of Brazil, is in the anteroom. I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished visitor be invited to enter the Chamber, and for that purpose that the Senate take a recess of 10 minutes so that he may have an opportunity of being presented to the Vice President and Senators.

I may add that the distinguished Brazilian comes to this country on an errand of comity and friendship. I know he will be gratified with the opportunity to meet the Members of this Chamber, and I may confidently assert that Senators will be glad to meet him.

The order submitted by Mr. O'GORMAN was read and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the minister of foreign affairs of Brazil, Dr. Muller, be admitted to the privileges of the floor of the Senate, and that to enable the Members of the Senate to exchange courtesies with him the Senate do now stand in recess for a period of 10 minutes.

The Senate thereupon took a recess for 10 minutes, during which time the Senators paid their respects to the distinguished visitor. At the expiration of the recess (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate was again called to order by the Vice President, who said:

I am directed by Dr. Muller to extend his thanks to the Members of the Senate and his appreciation of the courtesy extended to him, and although I do not understand the language in which he spoke, yet I will express his words in Hoosier language, which are that he considers this a red-letter day of his visit to this Republic.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 50 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 17, 1913, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 13, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, teach us patience, forbearance, courage, fortitude, the spirit of self-sacrifice in the routine duties of daily life, that we may build in the tissues of our being a character which, when the crucial test shall come twixt honor and dishonor, shall be strong enough to resist the evil and pursue the right. Since it is the sum of the small duties which make for the greater things in life and which make heroes of men in great crises, which often come without warning, so help us, under Thy guidance, to quit ourselves like men in all the circumstances of life. In the spirit of the Master, amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, June 10, 1913, was read and approved.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Senate print which I have covers case No. 291. This resolution covers the entire case, so far as the Supreme Court is concerned?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; it does.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether or not it is necessary to have this number printed, in view of the fact that the Senate has already ordered 10,000 copies printed?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is for their own use, and we shall not get any of them. The Members of the House are getting requests from lawyers and commissioners and others, and there is a large demand for copies. The Senate has printed 10,000 copies. We ask only 15,000 for the use of the Members of the House. That will give the Members of the House 30 or 35 copies apiece, and that is not too many.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I doubt if it is necessary to have the document duplicated in that way.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is necessary for the House to provide for its own quota.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire if the copies are to be distributed through the folding room?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; through the folding room. Each Member is to get his exact share.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON THE MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA ALIEN LAND LAW.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the California alien land act. There has been quite a demand for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document referred to is as follows:

An act relating to the rights, powers, and disabilities of aliens and of certain companies, associations, and corporations with respect to property in this State, providing for escheats in certain cases, prescribing the procedure therein, and repealing all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict herewith.

The people of the State of California do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. All aliens eligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States may acquire, possess, enjoy, transmit, and inherit real property, or any interest therein, in this State in the same manner and to the same extent as citizens of the United States, except as otherwise provided by the laws of this State.

SEC. 2. All aliens other than those mentioned in section 1 of this act may acquire, possess, enjoy, and transfer real property, or any interest therein, in this State in the manner and to the extent and for the purposes prescribed by any treaty now existing between the Government of the United States and the nation or country of which such alien is a citizen or subject, and not otherwise, and may, in addition thereto, lease lands in this State for agricultural purposes for a term not exceeding three years.

SEC. 3. Any company, association, or corporation organized under the laws of this or any other State or nation, of which a majority of the members are aliens other than those specified in section 1 of this act, or in which a majority of the issued capital stock is owned by such aliens, may acquire, possess, enjoy, and convey real property, or any interest therein, in this State in the manner and to the extent and for the purposes prescribed by any treaty now existing between the Government of the United States and the nation or country of which such members or stockholders are citizens or subjects, and not otherwise, and may, in addition thereto, lease lands in this State for agricultural purposes for a term not exceeding three years.

SEC. 4. Whenever it appears to the court in any probate proceeding that, by reason of the provisions of this act, any heir or devisee can not take real property in this State which, but for said provisions, said heir or devisee would take as such, the court, instead of ordering a distribution of such real property to such heir or devisee, shall order a sale of said real property to be made in the manner provided by law for probate sales of real property, and the proceeds of such sale shall be distributed to such heir or devisee in lieu of such real property.

SEC. 5. Any real property hereafter acquired in fee in violation of the provisions of this act by any alien mentioned in section 2 of this act, or by any company, association, or corporation mentioned in section 3 of this act, shall escheat to and become and remain the property of the State of California. The attorney general shall institute proceedings to have the escheat of such real property adjudged and enforced in the manner provided by section 474 of the political code, and title 8, part 3, of the code of civil procedure. Upon the entry of final judgment in such proceedings the title to such real property shall pass to the State of California. The provisions of this section and of sections 2 and 3 of this act shall not apply to any real property hereafter acquired in the enforcement or in satisfaction of any lien now existing upon or interest in such property so long as such real property so acquired shall remain the property of the alien company, association, or corporation acquiring the same in such manner.

SEC. 6. Any leasehold or other interest in real property less than the fee hereafter acquired in violation of the provisions of this act by any alien mentioned in section 2 of this act, or by any company, association, or corporation mentioned in section 3 of this act, shall escheat to the State of California. The attorney general shall institute proceedings to have such escheat adjudged and enforced as provided in section 5 of this act. In such proceedings the court shall determine and adjudge the value of such leasehold or other interest in such real property, and enter judgment for the State for the amount thereof, together with costs. Thereupon the court shall order a sale of the real property covered by such leasehold or other interest in the manner provided by section 1271 of the code of civil procedure. Out of the proceeds arising from such sale the amount of the judgment rendered for the State shall be paid into the State treasury and the balance shall be deposited with and distributed by the court in accordance with the interest of the parties therein.

SEC. 7. Nothing in this act shall be construed as a limitation upon the power of the State to enact laws with respect to the acquisition, holding, or disposal by aliens of real property in this State.

SEC. 8. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

BUSINESS CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the thoughtful and patriotic consideration of the present national administration, the Members of both Houses of Congress, to the press, and the American people the following wise and able editorial which appeared in the Journal of Commerce of New York City on June 10, 1913. This paper supported President Wilson in the last campaign.

GIVE BUSINESS, BIG AND LITTLE, A FAIR CHANCE.

Except for the tremendous absorption of capital in public and private undertakings and expenditures for purposes which are wasteful or nonproductive, or from which no immediate return is to be expected, causing a scanty supply for present demands and consequent high rates, conditions appear to be favorable in this country for prosperous industry and trade—that is to say, for "business." Last year we had abundant crops and fairly remunerative industries, and the prospects for this year would be unclouded but for scowling omens which appear in the political heavens and have been lowering over the country for several years with dubious and shifting menaces. There are no clear signs of trouble or of danger, but there is uncertainty and the fear which uncertainty breeds. There is hesitation and holding back, because calculations can not be made with the confidence that induces men to move hopefully forward. Business is in a nervous condition from which it needs relief if it is to escape prostration.

No doubt, as in other cases of nervous disorder, this condition has been brought about by bad ways of living in the past, errors and excesses, which required somewhat drastic treatment for their correction; but such treatment is apt to be exhausting and becomes dangerous if carried beyond normal limits. There have been abuses growing out of "privileges" granted by the Government in protecting domestic industries from foreign competition by excessive duties on imports, encouraging high cost of production, lax management, and abnormal prices in the home market. Partly as the result of this, there have been the evils of "trusts" and combinations to strangle domestic competition and exact excessive profits for the few at the expense of the many, enabling the strong and unscrupulous to crush out or swallow up those who have not the same advantages. Accompanying this there have been vigorous promotions and exploitations, entailing overcapitalization and speculative profits for those who escape the burdens and responsibilities of the actual conduct of business operations, concealing large profits for the successful and causing undeserved loss and failure to others. In the great field of transportation and interchange a few years ago there were abuses of discrimination, unfair rates, and charges, favors to some and injury to others, that the aggregate of earnings and profits might be increased, regardless of the injustice inflicted in detail upon the shipping and trading public.

These evils and abuses are now generally acknowledged. They caused complaints, bred discontent and unrest, and created a feeling of hostility to powerful capitalists, magnates of corporations, and captains of industry. They produced popular agitation, which was taken up by politicians, naturally and legitimately, but with a tendency to foment and aggravate them in order to gain popular favor and personal advancement. They led to legislation against "trusts" and combinations in restraint of trade and attempts at monopoly, and for the regulation of interstate commerce to put an end to excesses and abuses and establish just and reasonable conditions. The aim was to restore equality of opportunity and give all a fair chance in legitimate competition. Laws once instituted had to be enforced by prosecutions where necessary, and there was sometimes need of stern measures and severe penalties. Combinations had to be dissolved and wrongs indemnified so far as practicable, and tentative measures had to be strengthened. This remedial process has been going on for a series of years with the general support of public opinion, and it has been accomplishing its purpose more effectually than is generally recognized. A change of sentiment has been effected throughout the country which will prevent a relapse from what has been gained, and the time has come for moderating the treatment. It has become exhausting and needs now to be made recuperative.

There are many evidences of an acknowledgment of former errors, an acceptance of correction, and a willingness to comply with reasonable restrictions and requirements. There is a disposition, even an anxiety, to work in harmony with reasonable measures of regulation, to avoid grounds of complaint, and to cooperate with public authority for the restoration of confidence and good feeling and a return of prosperity in which all shall have a fair chance. The time has come for a considerate, encouraging, and helpful policy on the part of legislators and the Government. The tariff revision was necessary and must be completed, and there will have to be a more or less painful adjustment to changes; but there should be every effort to mitigate so far as possible the incidental suffering of such a remedial operation. Every unlawful or injurious combination of capital must be avoided, and continued vigilance will be necessary to maintain the observance of law. Railroads must be held to the rule of reason and equity in their rates and charges and the treatment of shippers and of the public which they are chartered to serve, but they must be permitted sufficient freedom to be able to perform effectively the service required of them.

The time has come for "letting up" on the policy of denunciation and harassing, of menace and threats where no new offense is committed or intended, and of further drastic legislation and prosecution while that which has been done is working out its effect with apparent success and wholesome results. Business is waiting to recuperate, to gain strength and proceed on its prosperous way again. Give it a chance. See that it has a fair chance where it is working in a small way in the vast field of competition, but do not hinder its accomplishment in a large way where it is equipped for it and pursues methods that are legitimate and lawful. The business of the country has grown to vast dimensions and commands large resources and ability for its conduct. Much of it must be done on a large scale by organized forces and skillful management to achieve the best results in the aggregate; but that need not prevent an equitable distribution of the proceeds and a general diffusion of benefit. What is most needed now is less activity of demagogues and crusaders, less agitation and outcry, and more comfort and encouragement for those who are striving honorably to restore prosperity to the country.

THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include a statement by the Right Rev. Charles Henry Brent, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Philippines.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, New York, N. Y., Apr. 21, 1913.]

FILIPINOS, IF FREE, PREY TO INVADERS—WOULD ULTIMATELY BE DEVOURED, SAYS BISHOP BRENT, WERE UNITED STATES TO RELINQUISH ISLAND RULE—MUST ATTAIN TO STRENGTH—DISTINGUISHED CHURCHMAN SUGGESTS THAT SEVERELY NONPOLITICAL COMMISSION INVESTIGATE CONDITIONS—NATION'S REPUTATION AT STAKE.

By the Right Rev. Charles Henry Brent, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Philippines.

"The principles involved in the Philippine problem are so far-reaching that there is no question upon which the Nation could more readily wreck its reputation." (Bishop Brent.)

"In this brief survey of Philippine affairs it will be my endeavor to separate facts from fancies and to strip the problem of secondary considerations. At an earlier stage in my experience I might have spoken with the same tone of infallibility which characterizes the utterances of those doughty champions of the Filipinos, who, clothed in the soft raiment of homespun theories, view the battle from afar. I have no solution of the Philippine problem to offer. My sole purpose is to urge upon the American Government slow speed and not to discard a good policy until sure of a better.

"No certainty can be reached without a study of facts. Ce ne sont pas les théories qui doivent nous servir de base dans la recherche des faits, mais ce sont les faits qui doivent nous servir de base pour la composition des théories. (It is not theories which should be used by us as a basis in the search for facts, but facts which should be used by us as a basis for the upbuilding of theories.)

"The first fact to face is one which admits of no dispute. It is that America is in the control of the Philippines, and upon her wisdom or unwisdom hangs the fate of 9,000,000 Filipinos. Whether we erred in assuming such a responsibility is aside from the question. If America had not accepted it from unselfish motives, another nation would have seized it from motives of self-interest, and at this date liberty would sit mourning without the gates of the Philippines instead of reigning throughout her borders.

"The Philippines to-day enjoy a measure of self-government hitherto unknown to dependencies save in the Anglo-Saxon overseas dominions of Great Britain, and the responsibility of America is to further the progress of self-government to the utmost of her ability and the Filipino's capacity.

ATTAINMENT REQUISITE.

"Thus are we brought to a second indisputable fact. We are pledged to execute our responsibility of control as a trust to be administered with rather than for the Filipino. That is to say, we are to train him by cooperative methods in the principles of self-government until he has attained, and then, if he so elects, surrender to him, the rights which belong to a full-grown nation. It is here that we arrive at the parting of the ways.

"The dispute, however, is not one of imperialism and anti-imperialism. It befogs the issue to employ such terms. The question resolves itself into one of good judgment. The opposing camps differ only in the matter of time. There are those who say now; others who saw to-morrow; still others who say day after to-morrow.

"If desire implied ability, the clamor for independence on the part of the Filipinos, which just now is more widespread than at any time in their history, would be the signal for our withdrawal, but only their achievements can determine their ability. A severely nonpolitical commission, composed of men of the type of, say, President Edwin A. Alderman and Seth Low, might be appointed to advantage by the President to undertake a patient and thorough investigation of the situation. A careful study should be made of the Malolos government of 1899, the character of provincial and municipal government up to date, the use of the franchise, the extent to which peonage and kindred evils prevail, the records of the assembly, and the constructive work, religious, scientific, educational, and industrial, accomplished under the present policy.

"It is, to say the least, dangerous to argue on the theory that any autonomy, no matter how slovenly, is preferable to alien rule with 'higher political efficiency' as its motto. There are moments, at any rate, as in Cuba, Santo Domingo, Nicaragua, and Mexico, when alien interference or even alien rule for a while is not counted amiss by our most fanatical individualists. It is for this reason that I say let us proceed from facts to theory. The facts are to be had for the asking, and the Philippine policy should stand or fall upon its record.

HOSTILE TO CHRISTIANS.

"A third fact is that the Philippine problem has a puzzling complexity, due to its island character and diversified population, of which one-tenth is composed of primitive folk of the hills and fanatical sons of Islam. The recognized leaders in the Philippines to-day, so far as racial qualifications are concerned, would have at least equal right to claim citizenship in Spain, China, or England. Thus far it is the men of mixed blood who are the politicians. The degree of capacity in the Filipino will not be revealed until the schoolboys of to-day are in active public life. Even among the Christianized peoples, because of their many tongues and limited though increasing intercommunication, there are sectional jealousies, but the wild peoples have a marked antipathy for their Christian neighbors because of a past history of harsh and unfair treatment at their hands.

"It is owing solely to the prodigious industry of the secretary of the interior of the Philippine Islands and his sincere enthusiasm for the welfare of the inhabitants of the mountain Province that a notable work of protection and development has been begun, which no one less well informed than he could continue effectively.

"As for the Moros, they are the traditional enemies of the Filipinos, as the ruined watch towers of the coast, even of northern islands, testify, nor has animosity diminished with time. Though there has probably been more order in the Moro Province since the beginning of the American occupation than during any corresponding period of time in history, the island of Jolo has steadily baffled the attempts of our ablest officers and administrators to pacify it. The withdrawal of the Spanish was the signal for outrages upon Christianized Filipinos within immediate reach of Moros, and there is no reason to suppose that history would fail to repeat itself the moment American control ceased.

PROBLEM INTERNATIONAL.

"Finally it must be recognized that the Philippine problem can not be settled without reference to its international bearing. Neutralization has been proposed. But can American or any other dipolmacy secure the neutrality of the powers? Would it mean anything if promises of neutrality were made? Is it not so that, though no existing military power, east or west, would fight America in order to secure possession of the Philippines, there are at least two nations which would seize the first opportunity for interference if American sovereignty ceased? Can America afford to protect a government halfway round the world which she does not actually and constructively control? She has found it difficult enough with one near at hand.

"It appears to me that it would be a measure of quixotry beyond the most altruistic administration to stand sponsor for the order of an experimental government of more than doubtful stability 10,000 miles from our coasts. When the Philippines achieve independence they must swallow the bitter with the sweet and accept the perils as well as the joys of walking alone. There are national risks involved, even in a limited protectorate, to which I trust America will never expose herself.

"I have said nothing about the interests of American commerce which has grown up in the Philippines, because it is not to the point. The most it can ask is an equitable protection and consideration, such as the presence of the American flag guarantees. Nor have I made any appeal for the retention of the present personnel of government, for I believe officeholders should stand or fall on their record, though it would indeed be a national calamity to degrade the Philippine question into a ball for party politicians and office seekers to buffet. My sole thought is for the enduring welfare of the Filipino people and the honor and wisdom of the American Nation in the execution of a great trust.

"My own conviction of our present duty, based on 11 years of observation and experience, is summed up in words written in relation to another dependency, but which I apply with a few verbal alterations to our own case:

"'The people of the Philippines require our rule. We are not in the Philippines for our pleasure or profit. If we were, it would be the most natural thing in the world to say that the game is not worth the candle as soon as intense difficulties and dangers arise and leave the Philippines to go to perdition in their own way. But we can not do that.

"'We are in the Philippines because we are required there. If our rule were removed, at this juncture at any rate, the Philippines would at once become a prey to the strongest of the sectional aggregations, and they in turn would ultimately be devoured by intruders from outside the borders of the Philippines. * * * 'We do not know how to leave the Philippines, and therefore let us see if we know how to govern them.'"

OKLAHOMA AND ITS POTENTIALITIES.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an interview with Gov. Cruce, published in the Manufacturers' Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, in its issue of June 12, 1913, under editorial correspondence, publishes an interview with the Hon. Lee Cruce, the governor of Oklahoma. The article is entitled "Oklahoma and its potentialities." In the organization of the new State political controversies and problems of state were given prominence at home and attracted wide attention throughout the Union. To-day the people of Oklahoma, more than ever before, are giving emphasis to the material development of the State. Capitalists, investors, manufacturers, and business seekers from other States are recognizing the great advantages and the splendid opportunities offered by Oklahoma.

I think it was William McKinley who emphasized the importance of planting the factory beside the farm. In no other State in the Union can this be done so successfully as in Oklahoma. We have the soil, the climate, the seasons, and the intelligent farmers to make Oklahoma one of the richest agricultural States in the Union. We have the oil, gas, coal, and other mineral products which in time will make Oklahoma a great manufacturing State. We have the natural resources which would enable Oklahoma, independent of the outside world, to feed, clothe, sustain, and support its own population—with all the comforts of life and many of the luxuries. Agriculture and manufacturing are the two great fundamental industries upon which other business interests are based and from which they draw support. The development of these two great industries side by side in the same State guarantees that Oklahoma will become one of the greatest wealth-producing States of the Union. My purpose, however, at this time is not to express my own ideas but to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the statement made by Gov. Lee Cruce. By the consent of the House I print the correspondence above referred to.

The article in the Manufacturers' Record is as follows:

GOV. CRUCE ON OKLAHOMA AND ITS POTENTIALITIES.

[Editorial correspondence Manufacturers' Record.]

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., June 1.

In discussing the general outlook for Oklahoma, based on its rich resources, Gov. Lee Cruce said:

"In my opinion there is no other State in the Union as richly endowed with natural resources as is Oklahoma. The people of the State are just beginning to realize the immense supply of mineral deposits that underlie our soil, and capital from other States seeking profitable investment is becoming acquainted at last with our natural resources.

"A number of years ago Oklahoma was regarded merely as a grazing region, and later on, when the rush of immigration into the State attracted the attention of the country, public interest was centered upon the utilization of its farm lands and in building cities.

"The mineral resources of the State at that time were practically undiscovered, and even to-day the country at large has but slight conception of the extent and variety of the mineral wealth of the State. In a general way it has become known that this State is one of the world's greatest oil-producing regions and that our gas fields are almost without limit, but the value of the oil industry is hardly recognized or its importance understood. Last year the oil production of the State was 52,000,000 barrels. For several years the price has ranged from 30 to 48 cents per barrel. At these figures the profit was comparatively small. Oil is now selling in Oklahoma at 88 cents per barrel, and in a good many cases the highest grades of oil bring a premium, in some instances amounting to 10 cents per barrel. This advance in price has resulted in greatly stimulating the industry, and it is quite probable that the production this year will exceed 60,000,000 barrels and that the value of this year's output will not be far from $60,000,000. Even these figures will be enlarged by the added value which is given by refining a portion of the oil in this State. Heretofore most of our oil has been piped out as crude oil, to be refined elsewhere, but these conditions are rapidly changing, and henceforth a large and increasing amount will be refined in the State.

"Again, Oklahoma is the greatest natural-gas region known. The supply apparently is great enough to last many years to come. While much of the gas is wasted, the State and the National Government are bringing about a better handling of the situation and more conservation in protecting our gas supply. Acts passed at the recent session of the Oklahoma Legislature will tend to greater conservation of this resource.

"In the gas-producing region manufacturers are getting this fuel at 3 cents per thousand feet, and in some cases even lower figures are reported. These companies have fuel at a cost so low as to amount almost to free fuel.

"Being a comparatively new Commonwealth, our industrial development has been limited, but the cheapness and abundance of our fuel supply, added to our other mineral resources, is bringing about a widespread interest in manufacturing industries. All over the State there is an active rivalry in securing new manufacturing enterprises, and many important plants for a variety of industries are under construction.

"Our vast stores of oil and gas are supplemented by more than 12,000 square miles of coal of good grade, which places this State among the leading coal areas of the country. In fact, our coal area exceeds by several thousand square miles the coal area of Great Britain, though the amount of coal in the State is probably less than that of Great Britain. Manufacturers are thus protected in the matter of fuel, and in the event of the gas supply becoming exhausted there will be a sufficient supply of coal to meet their needs.

"We have almost limitless stores of high-grade glass-making sand, cement rock, shale, fire-brick clay, granite, and marble and other materials on which to base a great manufacturing life. We have large deposits of asphalt of the highest grade, and this one resource alone, when properly developed, will add millions of dollars to the wealth of Oklahoma.

"Few of the States of the Union, in my opinion, possess the agricultural possibilities of Oklahoma. We are raising 1,000,000 bales of cotton a year and about 150,000,000 bushels of grain, and are transforming these great stretches of prairie that were used formerly for grazing purposes into productive farms. In addition to this, we are still grazing several million head of cattle, which net the investor a handsome profit.

"During the last year or two railroad building has been inactive, due in part to a general halting of railroad construction throughout the country, and in part to some of our laws, which may have temporarily interfered with railroad building in the State. At the present time there is a kindlier spirit existing between the railroads and the people of the whole State. It is quite probable that at an election to be held in August one of our restrictive railroad laws will be repealed, and I am assured that if this is done we shall have a considerable amount of railroad building by existing lines. The outlook is decidedly encouraging in respect to broader railroad activities throughout the State than for the last few years. Even now two systems are making very considerable extensions, one of them being financed by French capitalists, whose experts reported that their principals have very great faith in the future of this State. It is reported that this group of capitalists has invested about $18,000,000 in railroad and other operations in this State. Other capitalists upon the Continent and in Great Britain have been putting money freely into oil and gas operations throughout the State.

"Our development as a State has been on sound, safe lines. While we have made some mistakes in legislation and some mistakes in speculation, we have probably fewer mistakes in both than any other rapidly developing section has to its credit or discredit. Indeed, Oklahoma has been very much misrepresented throughout the country in its legislative work. We have probably made fewer mistakes than most other States in legislation, but it so happened that our mistakes were made the spectacular features of newspaper discussions at the time when Oklahoma was so new that everything it did commanded the widest attention. We were criticized throughout the land for every act of legislation on financial or railroad matters, which gave the foundation for newspaper discussion; but we did not receive the credit due the State for much wise legislation that was enacted during that period of evolution from an unknown or undeveloped Territory into a busy, bustling, rapidly developing State. We have passed through a pioneering period and have now settled down to regular routine in the betterment of agricultural conditions, in the wise utilization of our oil and gas, in making a beginning in the development of our other mineral resources, and in the sane and safe discussion of all laws bearing on all the interests of the State.

"In times past the railroads, by charging higher rates to points in this State and to near-by States, created for themselves a spirit of hostility which found expression in much of the legislation that has been regarded as inimicable, but now, with a better understanding between the railroads and the people, and with the splendid work which the railroads are doing in attracting men and money and industries into the State, the people of the whole State are disposed to cooperate to the utmost extent with the railroads and their good work and to give them every protection essential to their welfare and to the welfare of the State."

MAIL-ORDER BUSINESS.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman indicate the subject on which he wishes to extend his remarks?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. On the subject of the mail-order bill which I introduced in the House some time ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, on the 16th day of May I introduced a bill to provide for a tax upon all persons, firms, or corporations engaged in interstate mail-order business.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5308) to provide for a tax upon all persons, firms, or corporations engaged in interstate mail-order business, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons, firms, or corporations in the United States which are now conducting, or which may hereafter conduct, a mail-order business interstate for the purpose of selling goods, wares, and merchandise direct to the consumer shall pay a tax of 1 per cent upon the total cash value of all goods, wares, and merchandise sold within any State.

SEC. 2. That every person, firm, or corporation conducting a mail-order business as defined in section 1 of this act shall keep in proper books, to be provided by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, an accurate and complete account of all goods, wares, and merchandise of every character and description so sold, together with the actual selling price of the same.

SEC. 3. That on the 31st day of December, after the passage of this act, and on the 31st day of December of each year thereafter, every person, firm, or corporation engaged in such business shall render a full and complete statement to the Secretary of the Treasury, upon blanks to be furnished by him, of the total cash value of all goods, wares, and merchandise sold during the year in the various States of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine the amount of the tax to be paid by each person, firm, or corporation (at the rate of 1 per cent upon the total cash value of all goods, wares, and merchandise sold within any State) engaged in such mail-order business, and shall give notice of the amount of said tax due and payable, pursuant to the terms of this act in such manner as in his judgment is most practicable.

SEC. 5. That every person, firm, or corporation subject to said tax under the provisions of this act and reporting to the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay said tax on or before March 1 of each and every year after this act shall become a law.

SEC. 6. That the Federal courts of the United States shall have power to enforce the collection of said tax upon the application of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall apportion said tax among the several States in the ratio of the actual amount of goods sold in each State.

SEC. 8. That the tax so apportioned shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the various State treasurers entitled thereto; said tax to be used in such manner and for such purposes as the said States may by law direct.

The bill was not introduced on the spur of the moment; it was not presented without serious thought on my part. Untold millions are invested in this business to-day.

One mail-order house in the city of Chicago has 63 acres of floor space. Another one in the same city, according to the statement under oath of its president, made a net profit of $17,000,000 on last years' business.

A million-dollar building is to be erected by Montgomery Ward & Co. in Kansas City, to duplicate its present nine-story building at Nineteenth and Campbell Streets. This mail-order corporation is also about to enter New York, San Francisco, and Portland. Buildings for them are in course of construction at the present time.

The board of directors, at a recent meeting in New York, approved and authorized an increase in the capital stock from $500,000 to $40,000,000. The First National Bank of New York and the Morgan Banking Co. are to finance the proposition. That there is wonderful activity and that capital in almost unlimited quantities is being attracted to this mail-order business is further shown by an article in the Chicago Record-Herald of April 25, 1913, which reads as follows:

Advantages of Uncle Sam's new parcel post were capitalized yesterday when a $10,000,000 corporation was formed in Chicago to compete with mail-order houses already doing business here.

The Harris Bros. Co., the new concern, was born at a conference held in the Blackstone Hotel, attended by Chicago business men and eastern financiers. It takes over the business of the Chicago House Wrecking Co., a $2,000,000 concern, the Harris Co., and the Harris Steel & Wire Co.

Interests which controlled these three concerns joined with eastern financiers represented by the Max Oscher Co., a New York banking house, to form the new corporation. It is incorporated under the laws of Delaware. A special license to do business in Illinois was issued by the secretary of state at Springfield yesterday.

CHICAGOANS IN CONTROL.

Chicagoans will remain in control of the new company, but eastern capital will be represented on its board of directors. Officers of the new corporation are the same as those of the Chicago House Wrecking Co. They are:

Abraham Harris, president.
D. C. Harris, vice president.
Frank Harris, treasurer.
S. H. Harris, secretary.

The directors were elected yesterday, but their names will not be made public for a few days.

It was announced that the new parcel post was directly responsible for the formation of the corporation. The men who are interested declare that the experience they have had in the Chicago House Wrecking Co., which is the third in importance of the mail-order houses of the city, shows them that they can operate 50 per cent more economically by taking advantage of the parcel-post rates. The corporation will deal largely in such articles as clothing, boots and shoes, and other wearing apparel of all kinds, which can be shipped by parcel post.

NEW CAPITAL SCHEME.

The new corporation is really a refinancing of the three concerns which the Harris Bros. control. The Chicago House Wrecking Co. has been doing a mail-order business for years. It was originally formed in 1893 to dismantle the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, selling the machinery, building material, and other wreckage. It also dismantled the Pan American Exposition in Buffalo, the Trans-Mississippi Exposition in Omaha, and the Louisiana Purchase Exposition in St. Louis. The concern also purchased from the United States Government the equipment which the French installed when they endeavored to build the Panama Canal, selling it for scraps, and removed the Ferris wheel from Chicago to St. Louis just before the opening of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition.

From dismantling expositions the company branched out into the business of purchasing the stocks of bankrupt concerns at forced sales. To dispose of these stocks and of wreckage it began doing a catalogue mail-order business. Recently it has been doing a straight mail-order business. It has erected a plant with 950,000 square feet of floor space on a 22-acre tract at West Thirty-fifth and Iron Streets, in the new central manufacturing district.

SELLS HOMES BY MAIL.

The Harris Home Co. has been engaged in the business of selling homes complete by mail, various parts being shipped to purchasers. The Harris Steel & Wire Co. has done a similar business in the steel and wire line.

Harris Bros. Co. takes over the plants of all three concerns. It will erect in the near future two more buildings on the tract at West Thirty-fifth and Iron Streets, which will cost $250,000.

It will continue the mail-order business done by all the concerns, but the sale of contracting machinery, which formed a large portion of the business of the Chicago House Wrecking Co., will be continued by that concern under the old name.

One of the reasons for the incorporation of the new company was the fact that since the Chicago House Wrecking Co. became an important factor in the mail-order business its name was misleading. Officers of the company said they were continually obliged to correct the impression that it sold nothing except the material and articles it obtained in dismantling buildings, fairs, etc.

BUSINESS WILL GROW.

"There were many who did not realize that we were the third mail-order house in the city," said Maurice Rothschild, general manager of the house-wrecking company. "We will be able to correct that impression now, and with the new capital which we have obtained we will become even more important factors in the mail-order business. We have experimented with the parcel post ever since the new law went into force, and we find that under it we are able to decrease the carrying cost by 50 per cent. We will be able to give purchasers the advantage of this reduction in cost, and we expect to make things lively for the older mail-order houses."

The new company will issue $2,000,000 in preferred and $8,000,000 in common stock.

It should be perfectly apparent to every thinking person that the country merchant must go out of business as the great mail-order houses gradually close down upon the local markets.

In eight of our great States many towns have lost population during the last 10 years. Following are the States and the number of towns in each which have shown a decided decrease in their population, due very largely to the effect of the mail-order business:

State:	Number of towns.
Missouri	540
Iowa	564
Indiana	639
Michigan	677
New York	746
Illinois	788
Ohio	1,136
Pennsylvania	1,520

There is plenty of argument on both sides of this question. It is contended by the friends of the mail-order houses that as a broad economic question the right of the consumer to purchase wherever he can obtain the lowest prices should not be questioned, and that if the expanding mail-order business means the elimination of the country merchant, then the country merchant must go. If such arguments were logically sound, which I do not admit, there is still the social, moral, and religious view to be considered.

The retail merchant is the backbone of the country town. The mail-order house is his worst enemy. The farmer needs the town and the town must have the farmer. "Every resident of a community must be equally interested in the trade-at-home idea. If you spend your money where you get it you will be able to get it where you spend it."

The argument in favor of the country merchant and the danger which threatens him from the mail-order business is so clearly and comprehensively set forth in a communication from J. R. Moorehead to the Illinois vice commission that I am pleased to insert it in my remarks:

MARCH 12, 1913.

Senator EDMOND BEALL,
Member Senate Vice Commission,
Illinois Legislature, Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR SIR: I am writing this to say that your commission is not only striking at the roots of one of the greatest moral and social evils of our time, but you are also striking at the roots of the greatest economic problem that is now before the people of this country, in my judgment.

There is an actual revolution going on in this country, not only in the affairs of big business but in the affairs of the little business men as well, and the whole subject and the whole question to-day as to how this revolution is going to end, and as to where not only the little business man but the thousands and thousands of towns in the country are going to land, is being decided by those who are in control of the influences and business which you have been investigating and about which we have all been reading the past few days.

To be specific, the question to-day is whether or not the business as conducted by the great department stores and especially by the great mail-order houses is a good thing not only for the people who are living outside of Chicago and the other great centers but even the people of these great cities themselves. The fact is that the distribution of merchandise at retail in this country is fast getting into the hands of these great corporate organizations, and instead of the individual merchant carrying on a business for himself, his own landlord, his own master, owning his own business, and being a part of the community in which he lives, the retail business of the country is being carried on by these great aggregations of capital with the help, aid, and assistance of these girls and women who have been testifying before your committee, rather than by these more than a million individual self-sustaining merchants of the country.

If these conditions continue, not only where is the country town going to land, but how much more aggravated is going to become the very questions you are investigating at this time? For example, recent investigations have shown that 90 per cent of the towns in your State upon one of the great railway systems running between Chicago and St. Louis have less people living in them than they had in 1900; that in the great State of Iowa more than 400 towns have lost population as shown by the census of 1900 and 1910; and in the same period in the State of Missouri 540 towns have lost population, including 38, or one-third, of the county seats. This condition exists to a more or less degree not only in all of the States in this Mississippi and Missouri River Valley, but I believe the investigation we are now making will show this to be the case in practically every State in the Union, except possibly a few in the Southwest and far West, which are kept up by the flow of population to some extent from the other States.

It is not a question alone as to whether merchandise shall be retailed by those million retail merchants or by the great department stores and mail-order houses of the city, but what are the economic, social, moral, political, and religious problems that are growing and must inevitably come up for solution out of this condition.

The small retail merchants of this country of every class and kind are discouraged and disheartened, and know not what the day is going to bring forth, not only for them but for their own immediate families and the communities in which they live. And apparently it would seem that even the Government itself is against the little man in this fight, for just as soon as they combine to combat the influences of the mail-order houses these same mail-order houses come back with the Sherman law as a club and a menace to the little merchant in his attempt to protect himself and the community in which he lives.

The daily newspapers of the cities, which are largely supported by the advertisements of department stores, and the farm papers, which are largely supported by the mail-order house advertising, of course give very little aid and help to the merchant in the country town, and there has been carried on in this country for the past 10 years such a campaign of advertising in which denunciation and misrepresentation of the little merchant by these great aggregations has prevailed that there are to-day thousands and hundreds of thousands of people living in and about the smaller cities and towns of your State, my State, and all of the States who will not buy a dollar's worth of goods from a home merchant, and who will not even give him a chance to supply their wants because of the prejudice that has been engendered in their minds by this campaign on the part of the department stores and mail-order houses. The little merchant at home only seems to be a necessity to many thousands of our people living about us only when crops fail, when the strike is on, and when they have no money to send away to buy and when it becomes necessary to obtain the necessities of life by credit at the store of the home merchant.

I submit to you that this is creating a condition beside which no other question before us to-day is of such great importance to all of our people. For example, the great mail-order house of Sears, Roebuck & Co. last year offered to give a million dollars to be distributed over this country, $1,000 to each county which would employ a farm expert to teach our farmers how to improve their crops, the remaining amount necessary to obtain the services of such an expert to be paid by the State, county, the farmers, or the business men of the counties in which such appropriation was made.

I submit to you, sir, that this was the greatest scheme of advertising that has ever been undertaken in this country. Should the whole million dollars be accepted by a thousand counties in the various States there would be 1,000 men going about amongst our farmers who would be compelled out of sheer gratitude to say that this great work which was being done in the interest of the farmer was inaugurated and put on its feet by the greatest mail-order house in the country, and the total sum would be that 1¼ per cent upon the gross sales of this firm for the year 1912.

I submit to you, sir, that the chances are that very little credit would be given to the local merchant and the commercial clubs of the thousands of towns in the country, who would have to supply not only for the first year at least $2 for $1 supplied by the mail-order house, but would be seldom remembered.

In view of what you have learned in the past few days, I submit to you that it would have been a much greater work of charity had this million dollars been distributed during the year of 1912 to the more than 7,000 girls and women who are working for this firm in Chicago.

Another phase has developed to this great scheme of advertising, and that is that the fangs of this company have reached out and taken hold of the agricultural colleges and the political authorities of the State. Whenever a proposition is made to a county to provide one of these experts as supervisor, you never hear that this money is contributed by the mail-order house in Chicago, but you do hear that it is coming from the agricultural department of the State university or government or from some other source. In other words, it has reached that stage when our agricultural colleges and university authorities are ashamed to say where the money is coming from. I submit to you, sir, that not one of these authorities and not a politician in your State or my State would dare accept money in this way from Standard Oil or the International Harvester Co. I am not defending Standard Oil or the Harvester Trust, but it can be said in their favor that at least the Standard Oil Co. permits the home merchant to make a few cents upon oil which they sell, and every live town in the United States has at least one agent or representative selling the machinery of the International Harvester Co., upon which he is permitted to make a profit. Yet here is a great aggregation of capital, the chairman of whose board of directors, I am told, is president of one of the great New York banks, and yet we never hear any outcry because of the fact that Wall Street is attempting a control of the distribution of the necessities of life in this country, as it is being done, we believe, through the great mail-order houses. Away with any suggestions as to tainted money if contributions are to be accepted from such sources to promote agriculture or any other laudable purpose.

Again permit me to say that the other great question involved besides those which you are directly investigating at this time is, Is it a good thing for this country and will it be a good thing for all of the people if the retail business of the country is to be controlled and handled by great corporations employing both women and men at starvation wages, or will it be best for all that they shall be distributed over this country and remain in the hands of the many thousands of merchants who are to-day the prop and stay of every community in which they live in your State, in my State, and all of the others?

I believe your committee has already discovered how this condition is being brought about, and their success is based on the supposition that they sell cheaper than the home merchant. Have you not already discovered that the 50,000 women in Chicago who are living upon starvation wages are paying the price that enables this, if it be true, to be brought about? If these conditions are to be permitted to continue in order that some things may be sold cheaper, and if cheapness is the thing only to be desired, why not repeal our tariff laws that we have had on our statute books for 50 years, if that will cheapen anything? If reducing the tariff will partially cheapen some things, why not remove it entirely, in order that they may become still cheaper, if cheapness is what is to be desired? If we want some things cheaper in this country, why not make it unlawful for labor unions to fix prices on labor? If we want things cheap in this country, why not repeal our immigration laws—let in the Chinese, the Japanese, and Hindu? They could work at one-half the wages received in this country, and that would cheapen some things, if we wanted things merely cheap. If we want to cheapen some things, why do we make laws regulating hours of work for men as well as women? If we want to merely cheapen some things, why not have all of the merchandise of the country distributed by great corporations employing women at starvation wages? Why should we keep a million merchants, with families to support and communities to keep up, when it could be done so much cheaper by the mail-order houses, as indicated?

I submit to you, sir, and your committee that every argument that could be brought against a proposal of legislation looking to any change as above indicated would be a valid argument against the perpetuation or increasing of the facilities of the mail-order house to do business, and the elimination of the retail merchant and the many communities outside of our great centers.

You have already, as I have said, discovered that there are some things already too cheap in the great city of Chicago; and, in conclusion, permit me to say that there are a few other things that are too cheap in this country, and they are the reputations and standing of the million little merchants of the country when they are attacked by mail-order houses as being thieves and robbers and an unnecessary part of the economy of the country.

Pardon this lengthy discussion at this time, but believing that it is apropos to the occasion of your investigation now going on is my excuse for submitting it at this time.

Respectfully, yours,

J. R. MOOREHEAD, Secretary.

The local merchant contributes to the upbuilding of the community in which he lives. He is a part of its social and religious life. His family constitute a part of the moral force of the community. His stock of goods is assessed for the purposes of local taxation by the assessor. He pays a very large proportion of the necessary expenses of maintaining the municipal government. He contributes to the thousand and one demands of the social, religious, and political well-being of his village or city. His success and prosperity is the success and prosperity of the community generally. His poverty and failure spells the doom of the country town and village in which he lives.

Shall the distribution of all commodities used by the people be made by the million and more merchants in our land, or shall it be confined to a few billion-dollar corporations? The great mail-order corporations have no difficulty in underselling the retail dealer, no matter how much he may reduce his margin of profit. Buying, as they do, from prison contractors the products of convict labor, they secure many of their manufactured articles at prices that would be utterly impossible to obtain if made by free labor. They, of course, are the largest distributors of prison-made goods in the country, which is one of the secrets of their large profits and ability to undersell. This source of supply is, of course, unopen to the small retailer, even if he was inclined to avail himself of it.

And when the local merchant has been eliminated from the equation of modern economics will prices to the consumer be any lower than they are now? All these questions must be answered in the near future, and whether or not this bill is reported to the House or lies dead and buried in committee they are questions of the very gravest importance that will not down.

THE PUBLIC AND THE RAILROADS.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed a copy of a speech delivered by Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, of Pennsylvania, upon the subject of the legal relations of the public to railroad corporations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speech of Mr. Black referred to is as follows:

RAILROAD MONOPOLY—ARGUMENT TO THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

"Mr. Chairman, the irrepressible conflict between the rights of the people and the interest of the railroad corporations does not seem likely to terminate immediately. I beg your permission to put our case on your record somewhat more distinctly than heretofore.

"Why do I give myself this trouble? My great and good friend, the president of the Reading Railroad Co., expresses the suspicion that I am quietly acting in the interest of some anonymous corporation. I wish to contradict that as flatly as I can.

"The charge that I am communist enough to wish the destruction of all corporate property is equally untrue. I think myself the most conservative of citizens. I believe with my whole heart in the rights of life, liberty, and property, and if anybody has struggled more faithfully, through good report and evil, to maintain them inviolate, I do not know who he is. I respect the State constitution; perhaps I am prejudiced in favor of natural justice and equality. I am convinced that without the enforcement of the fundamental law honest government can not be expected.

"These considerations, together with requests of many friends, should be sufficient reason for doing all the little I can to get 'appropriate legislation.' At all events it is unfair to charge me with any motive of lucre or malice.

"It is not proposed by those who think as I do that any corporation shall lose one atom of its property. A lawful contract between a railroad company and the State is inviolable and must not be touched by hostile hands, however bad the bargain may have been for the people. Mr. Gowen, and all others with similar contracts in their hands, are entitled each to his pound of flesh, and, if it be 'so nominated in the bond,' the Commonwealth must bare her bosom to all their knives and let them 'cut nearest the heart.'

"But we, the people, have rights of property as well as the corporations, and ours are—or at least they ought to be—as sacred as theirs. Between the great domain which we have conceded to them and that which still belongs to us the line is plainly and distinctly marked, and if they cross it for purposes of plunder they should be driven back under the lash of the law. It is not the intent of the amended constitution nor the desire of those who demand its enforcement to do them the slightest injury. We only ask for that impartial and just protection which the State, as parens patriæ, owes to us not less than to them.

"In the first place, it will, I think, be admitted by all impartial persons of average intelligence that the companies are not the owners of the railroads. The notion that they are is as silly as it is pernicious. It is the duty of every commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural State to open thoroughfares of trade and travel through her territory. For that purpose she may take the property of citizens and pay for the work out of her treasury. When it is done, she may make it free to all comers, or she may reimburse the cost by levying a special tax upon those who use it; or she may get the road built and opened by a corporation or an individual, and pay for it by permitting the builder to collect tolls or taxes from those who carry and travel on it. Pennsylvania has tried all these methods with her turnpikes, canals, and railroads. Some have been made at her own cost and thrown open; on others, made by herself, she placed officers to collect a special tax; others have been built for her by contract, in which some natural or artificial person agreed to do the work for the privilege of appropriating the taxes which she authorized to be levied.

"But in all these cases the proprietary right remained in the State, and was held by her in trust for the use of the people.

"Those who run the railroads and canals are always public agents. It is impossible to look at them in any other light, or to conceive how a different relation could exist; because a railroad which is not managed by public agent can not be a public highway. The character of these agents and the mode of their appointment, even upon the same work, have differed materially. The Columbia Railroad and all the canals were for a time under the management of officers appointed by the governor, or elected by the people, and paid out of the State treasury. Afterwards the duty was devolved by the State upon persons associated together under acts of incorporation who contracted to perform it upon certain terms. The Erie & Northeast Railroad was at first run for the State by a company; the company was removed from its trust for misbehavior; the governor then took it and appointed an officer to superintend the work; later the governor's appointee was displaced, with the consent of the legislature, and the duty was again confided to a corporation newly chartered.

"None of these agents—neither the canal commissioners nor the State receiver, nor any corporation that went before or came after—had the slightest proprietary right or title to the railroads themselves. To say that they had would be as preposterous as to assert that township roads are the private property of the supervisors.

"The legal relations existing between the State and the persons whom she authorizes to supervise her highways was somewhat elaborately discussed by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in the case of the Erie & Northeast Railroad Co. v. Casey (2 Casey, pp. 307–324). It was there determined that a railroad built by authority of the State for the general purposes of commerce is a public highway, and in no sense private property—that a corporation authorized to run it is a servant of the State as much as an officer legally appointed to do any other public duty, as strictly confined by the laws, and as liable to be removed for transgressing them.

"All the judges concurred in this opinion. The two who dissented from the judgment did so on the technical ground that certain circumstances, which would have estopped the State in a judicial proceeding, disarmed the legislature of the power to repeal. Neither they nor any other judge in this country, whose authority is worth a straw, ever denied the doctrine for which I have here cited that case, though it may have been sometimes overlooked, ignored, or perchance evaded. This principle and no other was the basis of the decision in Pennsylvania and all the other States, that cities and counties might issue bonds or their money and tax their people to aid in building railways. The Supreme Court of the United States has affirmed it in scores of cases. It was so universally acknowledged that the convention of 1873 incorporated it into the constitution as a part of the fundamental law. I do not know upon what foundation more solid than this any great principle of jurisprudence was ever established in a free country. When, in addition, you consider the reason of the thing, and the supreme necessity of it for the purposes of common justice, it seems like a sin and a shame and a scandal to oppose it.

"It being settled that the railroads and canals belong of right to the State for the use of the people, and that the corporations who have them in charge are mere agents to run them for the owners, it will surely not be denied that all proper regulations should be made to prevent those agents from betraying their trust. The wisdom is very plain of those provisions in our constitution which put them on a level with other public servants, and forbid them to prostitute their functions to purposes merely mercenary, or to engage in any business which necessarily brings their private interests into conflict with their public duty. Seeing the vast magnitude of the affairs intrusted to them, and the terrible temptation to which their cupidity is exposed, it is certainly necessary that you hold them to their responsibilities, and hold them hard.

"But, on the other hand, the corporations deny that they owe any responsibility to the State, more than individuals engaged in private business. They assert that the management of the railroads being a mere speculation of their own, these thoroughfares of trade and travel must be run for their interest without regard to public right. If they take advantage of their power to oppress the labor and overtax the land of the State; if they crush the industry of one man or place to build up the prosperity of another; if they plunder the rich by extortion, or deepen the distress of the poor by discriminating against them, they justify themselves by showing that all this was in the way of business; that their interest required them to do it; that if they had done otherwise their fortunes would not have been so great as they are; that it was the prudent, proper, and successful method of managing their own affairs. This is their universal answer to all complaints. Their protests against legislative intervention to protect the public always take this shape, with more or less distinctness of outline. In whatever language they clothe their argument, it is the same in substance as that with which Demetrius, the silversmith, defended the sanctity of the temple for which he made shrines, 'Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth.'

"That railroad corporators and their paid adherents should take this view of the subject is perhaps not very surprising, nor does it excite our special wonder to see them supported by the subsidiary rings whom they patronize. But it is amazing to find that this odious and demoralizing theory has made a strong lodgment in the minds of disinterested, upright, and high-placed men. Two members of the senate judiciary committee, I do not say the ablest, because comparisons are odious, but they are both of them among the foremost men of the country for talents and integrity—these gentlemen emphatically dissented from me when I asserted that the management of the railroads was not a matter of business to be conducted like a private enterprise, merely for the profit of the directors or stockholders. A heresy so supported is entitled to serious refutation, however absurd it may seem on its face.

"I aver that a man or a corporation appointed to do a public duty must perform it with an eye single to the public interest. If he perverts his authority to purposes of private gain, he is guilty of corruption, and all who aid and abet him are his accomplices in crime. He defiles himself if he mingles his own business with that intrusted to him by the government and uses one to promote the other. If a judge excuses himself for a false decision by saying that he sold his judgment for the highest price he could get, you cover his character with infamy. A ministerial officer, like a sheriff, for instance, who extorts from a defendant, or even from a convict in his custody, what the law does not allow him to collect and puts the surplus in his pocket is a knave upon whom you have no mercy. You send county commissioners to the penitentiary for consulting their own financial advantage to the injury of the general weal. When the officers of a city corporation make a business of running it to enrich themselves at the expense of the public, you can see at a glance that they are the basest of criminals. Why, then, can you not see that the officers of a railway corporation are equally guilty when they pervert the authority with which they are clothed to purposes purely selfish? A railroad corporation is a part of the civil government as much as a city corporation. The officers of the former as much as the latter are agents and trustees of the public, and the public has an interest precisely similar in the fidelity of both. Why, then, should partiality or extortion be condemned as criminal in one if it be tolerated as fair business when practiced by the other? Yet there are virtuous and disinterested statesmen among us who think that faithful service ought not to be enforced against the railroad companies, however loudly it may be claimed by the body of the people as their just due and no matter how distinctly it may be commanded by the constitution itself.

"I am able to maintain that all the corruption and misgovernment with which the earth is cursed grows out of this fatal proclivity of public servants to make a business of their duty. Recall the worst cases that have occurred in our history and see if every one of them does not finally resolve itself into that. Tweed and his associates in New York, the Philadelphia rings, the carpetbag thieves, the star-route conspirators—all went into business for themselves while pretending to be engaged in the public service. Oakes Ames distributed the stock of the Crédit Mobilier where he thought it would do the most good to himself and others with whom he was connected, and that was business in him who gave and in them that took his bribes. Madison Wells, when he proposed to Mr. Kenner that he would make a true return of the election if he could be assured of getting '$200,000 apiece for himself and Jim Anderson and a less sum for the niggers,' had as keen an eye to business as if he had been president of a railroad company instead of a returning board. Certain greedy adventurers made it a business to rob the Nation of its lands, and uniting with Congress carried it on so magnificently that they got away with an area nearly equal to nine States as large as Pennsylvania. The imposition of the whisky tax, excluding what was held on speculation, was business to the officers and legislators who were sharp enough to anticipate their own votes. You will see on reflection that every base combination which officers have made with one another or with outside parties has been a business arrangement, precisely like that which the railroads justify on the sole ground that it is business. The effect is not only to corrupt those who engage in such transactions but to demoralize all who are tempted by personal and party attachments to apologize for it.

"When the officers of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. corruptly bought the remission of the tonnage tax, and thereby transferred to their own pockets an incalculable sum justly due to the State, it was business, rich to them and profitable beyond the dreams of avarice, while to the swindled taxpayers it was proportionably disastrous. The nine million steal of later date was a business enterprise which failed because Gov. Geary most unexpectedly put his veto upon it. Still more recently the same corporation undertook to get from the treasury of the State $4,000,000 to which it had no decent pretense of a claim. Never was any affair conducted in a more perfectly business-like way. The appointed agents of the corporation came to Harrisburg when the legislature was in session, and regularly set up a shop for the purchase of members at prearranged and specified prices. You condemn this piece of business because it was dishonest, but was it more dishonest than that which the same corporation habitually does when it stands on the highway and by fraud or force extracts from individual citizens a much larger sum in excessive tolls to which its right is no better than to the money it tried to get by bribery?

"The functions of railroad corporations are as clearly defined and ought to be as universally understood as those of any servant which the State or General Government employs. Without proprietary right in the highways they are appointed to superintend them for the owners. They are charged with the duty of seeing that every needed facility for the use of those thoroughfares shall be furnished to all citizens, like the justice promised in Magna Charta, without sale, denial, or delay. Such services, if faithfully performed, are important and valuable, and the compensation ought to be a full equivalent; accordingly, they are authorized to pay themselves by levying upon all who use the road a tax or toll or freight sufficient for that purpose.

"But this tax must be reasonable, fixed, certain, and uniform, otherwise it is a fraud upon the people which no department of the State government, nor all of them combined, has power to legalize.

"It is much easier to see the nature and character of the mischief wrought by the present practices of the railroad companies than it is to calculate its extent. If your action depends in any degree upon the amount of the spoliation which the people of the State have suffered, and are now suffering, for want of just laws to protect them, you certainly ought to direct an official inquiry into the subject and ascertain the whole truth as nearly as possible.

"But investigations have already taken place in Congress and the legislatures of several States; complaints founded upon specified facts come up from every quarter; verified accusations are made by some of the companies against others; railroad men have openly confessed their fraudulent practices, and sometimes boasted of the large sums they accumulate by them. Putting these together, you can form at least an approximate calculation. I doubt not you will find the sum total of the plunder they have taken in the shape of excessive charges to be frightful.

"Three or four years ago a committee of the United States Senate collected the materials and made a report upon this general subject, in which they showed that an excess of 5 cents per hundredweight charged on the whole agricultural crop of the current year would amount to $70,000,000. Upon the crop of the last year it would doubtless come nearer a hundred millions. The railroads would not get this sum, because not near all of it is carried, but it would operate as an export tax operates; that is to say, the producer, the consumer, or the intermediate dealer, would lose that amount on the whole crop, carried or not carried. In 1880 the charges from Chicago to the eastern markets were raised from 10 cents per hundredweight to 35 cents, the latter rate being unquestionably twice as high as a fair one. You can count from these data the terrible loss sustained by the land, labor, and trade of the country. It was the end and the attainment of a combination still subsisting between the great trunk lines, as they are called, to pool their receipts, to stop all competition, to unite the stealing power of all into one grand monopoly, and put the whole people at their mercy. It was a criminal conspiracy by the common and statute law of all the States.

"The magnitude of these excessive charges is not the worst thing about them. The corporations think it perfectly right to raise or lower the freight as they please without regard to the rights or interest of anybody but themselves. A grain grower, manufacturer, miner, or merchant, who can sell his goods at a profit, if he can get them carried at the rates of to-day, may find himself ruined to-morrow by an increase which did not enter into his calculations. A rise in the market inures not to the benefit of the producer, but to the use of the carrying corporations, which openly avow that their rule is to charge in all cases as much 'as the traffic will bear'; that is to say, as much as the shipper can submit to without being driven entirely off the road. You must see plainly that this power to depress agriculture, to diminish the profits of manufacturing industry, and to skin the commerce of the whole country by the arbitrary use of a sliding scale upon freights, can not safely be trusted to human hands, and especially not to irresponsible corporations whose interest, as well as their acknowledged principle of action, constantly impel them to abuse it. Can it be that a Pennsylvania legislature will hesitate to curb the career of this destructive monopoly by adjusting the charges according to some rule equitable, fixed, and certain?

"But even this sinks into insignificance compared with the wrong and evil of their discriminations. Common justice, sound policy, every sense of duty, the whole spirit and letter of the law, require them to give every man equal facilities in the use of the roads, and to charge them at the same rates for the same class of goods, according to weight and distance. There can be no possible doubt about this. Every unprejudiced man, who has sense enough to know his right hand from his left, acknowledges that equality must be the rule of right; and he understands this perfectly well without looking at the constitution, where it is solemnly declared to be part of the lex legum, the law of laws, and the rule of all rules on the subject. Yet this sacred principle is constantly and steadily violated, trampled under foot, and treated with heartless contempt.

"At the slightest glance you will see the enormous injury, direct and consequential, which these discriminations inflict upon the public. A man who invests his capital or employs his time in mining or manufacturing can be driven into bankruptcy at any time by a discrimination against him and in favor of his competitors. This is done every day and all the time, not in a few cases here and there, but systematically and regularly, whenever a carrying monopoly conceives that its own interests can be promoted in that nefarious way; and it will continue to be done until the prohibition of the constitution is enforced by penal enactment.

"Instead of breaking the foul bulk of these enormities, I will give you a sample—convenient because it is small and easily handled. A neighbor and friend of mine—in partnership with another—became the lessee and operator of a coal mine in Northumberland. For a short distance they were obliged to carry their product over one of the branches of the Pennsylvania company. They were charged for the use of the road and motive power alone—there was no loading or unloading in the case, and no cars were furnished by the company—at about the rate of 20 cents per ton per mile, while others whom the monopoly chose to favor were let off at 2 cents. They paid the excess under protest, and brought suit to recover it back. It was as simple a case of extortion as can be conceived, but certain officers of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. swore that in their judgment it was right to commit it, and, moreover, declared that it was a usual, common, and customary practice. I blush to acknowledge that in all this the Supreme Court indorsed and abetted the corporation. The dialectics of the decision turned on a prohibition in the charter against charging more on an average than 4 cents per ton per mile, which was construed as a legal warrant for any robbery of one person which the company could prove to be balanced by the aggregate of favors shown to all others. But neither the greatest corporation in the State nor the highest judicial tribunal paid any respect whatever to the principle that all men's rights to the use of the public highway are equal.

"It is known and not denied that this equality of right, sacred and fundamental though it be, is by the common practice of carrying companies corruptly disregarded.

"If you want to drive business competition out of the field, bribe a railroad manager to raise the freights upon your rivals and lower your own, or take the whole board of directors into partnership with you, or promise to divide the spoils with the corporation, and they will make you a monopoly with power to plunder, limited only by the range of your dealings. The loss thus inflicted upon the worthiest men in the land is startlingly large. By a single one of these arrangements—that with the Standard Oil Co.—the estimated injury, direct and consequential, to honest persons within the State amounts to not less than a hundred and fifty million dollars. For this fact you have the statement of Mr. Gowen, whose veracity no man that knows him will doubt, and whose faculties of observation, sharpened by a personal interest in the subject, make him a most intelligent witness.

"At whatever place one of these railroad corporations has power to control the whole carrying trade, or where several combine together for that purpose, they victimize the people remorselessly. I give you the example of York, for the reason that it presses itself on my own attention with peculiar force. The freight exacted on the single article of anthracite coal is nearly $1 per ton more than is charged upon the same commodity carried from the same mine and delivered by the same company at Baltimore. In all reason and conscience it should be from 50 cents to a dollar less, seeing that the distance is 60 miles greater to Baltimore. That makes the discrimination against York at least equal to a dollar and a half on every ton. The quantity consumed in the latter place is something upward of a hundred thousand tons, and the excessive tax upon it all is therefore $150,000. Every cent of this is as wrongfully taken as if it were feloniously stolen. It amounts to many times as much in the aggregate as all the legitimate taxes which the same community pays for the support of the State, county, schools, and almshouses. Nay, it is more than all the taxes imposed for those purposes on the whole of the great county in which the town of York is situated. A manufacturer there who uses 2,000 tons of coal per annum must pay $3,000 of blackmail to the railroads, or to the monopoly which they have created, unless the influence of his wealth gets it remitted. But the largest part of it is levied upon poor laborers whose wages are barely sufficient to furnish their families in scanty measure with food, shelter, and clothing; much of it is paid by the contributions of charity for those who would otherwise perish by cold and hunger. The man who can hear the simple story of this wrong without indignation must be as cold-blooded as a snake.

"You need not confine your sympathies to York. I can give you no exact account of the similar suffering inflicted on Philadelphia. But any officer of the Reading company can furnish it. Mr. Gowen, free spoken as he is about the sins of his rivals, is naturally reticent concerning his own. But if he opens his mouth he will tell you the truth, and, unless I am much mistaken, it will be an awful tale of wrong and oppression.

"A full inquiry, if it shall ever be instituted, will probably show that nearly all the railroad corporations, the smaller ones following the example of the greater, have violated their charters by engaging 'in mining and manufacturing articles for transportation over their own works,' and thus acquired a monopoly of the production as well as the carrying. It is in this way that the Reading company has got the coal market of Philadelphia under its foot. Why should not that corporation and the others be made to respect the majesty of justice by an enforcement of the constitution (sec. 5, Art. XVII), which, if it leaves them what they have already got in violation of law, will at least prevent or punish such outrages in the future?

"The imperious necessity, however, of enforcing the constitution arises out of the depredations which they commit upon all classes everywhere within the State in what they call their local rates. You can take the figures known to be true and demonstrate by the plainest process of simple arithmetic that their tariff of rates for carrying goods from place to place within the State is extortionate beyond all reason.

"They have not the face to deny that their through rates are high enough to give them all the compensation they can reasonably demand for that part of their service. The trunk lines struggled and fought for that trade against one another with a fierceness which showed that they regarded it as very profitable. Their own competition reduced it for a while, but they combined and raised their charges high enough to satisfy all of them. It is ridiculous to say that this mutual agreement fixed the rates below a fair standard. That is a sort of error which monopolists never commit. Accepting the almost unanimous testimony of disinterested persons who ought to know whereof they affirm, the belief is fully authorized that they have fixed their through rates unreasonably high; but we will assume that they are only fair. That point being satisfactorily established, it follows, as the day follows the night, that the much higher rates which they charge on local freights are unjust and extortionate, a palpable violation of our rights, a gross offense against the constitution.

"I use the word 'rate' in the popular and legal sense as meaning the ratio or proportion of the whole charge to the distance the freight is carried. Thus if a ton be carried 600 miles from Chicago to Philadelphia for $5, and the same charge be made for carrying it 12 miles from Philadelphia to Media, the rate in the latter case is fifty times as high as in the former. I am credibly informed that such disproportioned charges are or have recently been made, and that as a general rule all local freights, whether the haul be long or short, are charged, without regard to distance, the same, or nearly the same, that would be charged on the same weight if carried from Chicago to Boston. To the extent of this enormous discrimination against our own people they are robbed and plundered.

"The effect of it upon the agricultural interest can not be ascertained exactly without an investigation, which you can make and I can not; but the reasonable probability is that it takes most unjustly from 7 to 10 cents per bushel from the price of all grain grown in the State and correspondingly reduces the value of all other products.

"Then look how it touches the rights and interests of consumers in the great centers of population. Within a circle of 150 miles in diameter around Philadelphia provisions enough might be raised to feed the city, but they can not be taken there without paying a freight on them as heavy as it would cost to bring them from Illinois or Wisconsin. Thus an army of a million souls, some of them half mad with hunger, virtually have their base of supplies moved back six or seven hundred miles away.

"These railroad men have another way of cheating the public, not for the benefit of their corporate treasuries but to swell the private fortunes of the managers. A ring of them is formed into a separate transportation company with the privilege of carrying on their own roads at the highest freights they can extort. By means of preferences and discriminations the parent corporation forces into the hands of its bastard offspring as much of the business as it wants, for the shipper who refuses to patronize the ring must suffer the penalty of still higher rates as well as delay and difficulty. The convention of 1873 believed that this was one of the devices for fleecing the trade of the Commonwealth which ought to be broken up, and the people adopted that opinion. Do you wish to continue it? If not, why do you hesitate to carry out the constitutional prohibition?

"Perhaps the most remarkable, certainly the boldest, thing about the discriminations we complain of is that they are always avowedly made against those who are least able to endure the wrong. A heavy grain dealer in the West who ships his millions may get rates 90 per cent below those extorted from a Pennsylvania farmer with only a thousand bushels to carry. Between all rivals of unequal fortune the railway king is ever strong upon the stronger side and never fails to make his discrimination against the weaker concern whose business is conducted on the smaller scale. In my town of York the demand of some very rich manufacturers for lower rates has been conceded with gratifying promptness, but you might as well plead pity with a wolf as ask the monopoly to relieve a starving laborer by taking the excessive charges off his bread and fuel. Indeed, if the tariffs of railway charges be founded in any rule at all it is this, that all rates shall be high in inverse proportion to the magnitude of the cargo and the distance it is carried, the practical effect of which is to grind the face of the small trader that the great one may increase in fatness.

"The only argument they make against the equality of rates commanded in the constitution is that they can not afford it; that they must charge higher for short hauls and light loads or else their compensation will be less than for the greater service. If this were true, it would be no ground of justification. But, in point of fact, it is wholly untrue. It is not more difficult or costly to carry a hundred tons for fifty shippers than it would be to carry the same goods for one. The expenses incident to the reception and discharge of a cargo may be greater in proportion for short hauls than for long ones, but you can make that all even by allowing them to charge, in addition to their mileage, for loading and unloading, whether the haul be short or long. These terminal expenses which they make so much ado about are nothing as an excuse for the enormous excesses of their local rates, and they know that very well. Their real reason is that they find it easier, safer, and more profitable to cheat a thousand poor men than one who is powerful enough to resist them or rich enough to bribe them.

"But they insist that they have a chartered right to do these things; that they have purchased from the State the privilege of charging unreasonable tolls and making such discriminations as they think best for themselves without regard to justice; that the State has sold out to them the power of protecting the people against any wrong of that kind which they may choose to commit, and that the constitution which forbids them is itself unconstitutional, because it impairs the obligation of a contract. Let us see whether there be or not any truth in this plea.

"If the State had in express terms authorized them to impose unreasonable tolls or taxes upon the people for the use of their own roads the grant would be void. Judge Baldwin's opinion to that effect in Bonaparte v. The Camden & Amboy Railroad Co., has never been denied or its soundness doubted from the day it was delivered to the present time. To give the corporation a power like that would be to give it the public highway as private property; to arm a body of mere adventurers with the police authority of the Commonwealth, and to convert railroad managers from public servants into public robbers. You might as well say that the legislature could sell the State out and out.

"Upon the same principle a grant of authority to discriminate between one citizen and another is worthless. The rights of all the people to be protected against robbery and extortion are precisely equal, and the legislature can not barter away one more than the rest; that is to say, a wholesale bargain of that kind would be no worse than a contract to sell the rights of individual citizens at retail.

"If, therefore, these companies had a bargain with the State, expressly giving them power to charge unreasonable or discriminating freights, it would be a mere nullity and, of course, revocable at the will of the legislature.

"But no such contract was ever made between this State and any railroad company—at least I never saw an act of incorporation upon which a decent pretense of that kind could be set up.

"You must remember that in a public grant, whether of land, money, or franchises, nothing passes by construction. The grantee at the very utmost gets only what is given in express words of which the sense is too plain to be misunderstood. Nothing goes by inference. No ambiguous phrase carries with it anything to swell the dimensions of the gift.

"Now, where is the express grant of power to take more than a fair and reasonable toll for the use of any railroad? In what act of incorporation is it stipulated that the State may not adjust the tolls according to what she, by her proper authorities, shall deem a reasonable rule? The sole answer ever given to this is that in some, if not all, of the charters there is a provision forbidding the company to make any charge beyond a certain rate per ton per mile, and from this prohibition against taking more they infer the right to take, in spite of the State, anything they please under that maximum, whether it be reasonable or not. But it is precisely such inferences that you can not make; they are excluded by the rule of interpretation already mentioned.

"Neither does their practice of discrimination find the slightest countenance in any word of the charters. When did you ever see an act of incorporation expressly declaring that the company shall have power to make a difference between two citizens whose legal and natural rights to the use of the highway are precisely the same? Where do you find the words which clothe any company with the awful power to crush out the business of one man with burdens which he can not bear in order that another in which the railroad has an interest may be built up? But especially and particularly I desire to know what part of any bargain with the State justifies the extortion of higher rates from a poor man on his little freights than from a rich one on his great and valuable cargoes? If you can not put your finger on the very words that give this authority, then the authority is withheld and the practice forbidden.

"But that is not all. The limitation of the charges to rates, perfectly and uniformly proportioned to weight and distance, must be apparent to anyone who will consider the nature of the contract, the subject matter of it, and the parties to it. The Commonwealth, reserving the equal proprietary rights of all the people to the use of the highway, agrees to employ a corporation as her agent, to see that the exercise of the right by every citizen is properly facilitated, and never in any case impeded, delayed, or hindered. The agent agrees to do this service at rates which in the aggregate will be a reasonable compensation for all the labor and expense of it. As between the State, who is the employer, and the corporation, which is the employee, the contract is an entire one—a lump bargain—an agreement to do one whole job, which comprehends all the carrying for all the people on that highway at a price for which the only measure furnished by the contract is weight and distance. Whenever in those acts of incorporation any mention is made of rates, taxes, or tolls they are spoken of as proportioned to the use made of the road by him who pays them—so much per ton per mile, whether the miles be many or few, up grade or down, without regard to the number of tons carried at one time or at different times for the same shipper.

"Let me illustrate a little further: If you make a contract to do a job of excavation at a price per cubic yard which gives you a heavy profit on the whole job, have you a legal right to demand additional pay for particular parts of it which you allege to be harder than the rest? I do not say what claim you might have upon the liberality of your employer if the bargain, taken altogether, were a losing one; I only ask whether you could, by construction of the contract, charge more for one yard than another?

"Take a case more precisely analogous. A contractor agrees to pave a mile of street at so much per foot, taxing the owners of the lots for the number of feet that front upon each one's property. Such contracts have been often made by the authorities of towns and cities, and they have never been understood to warrant a higher charge per foot against the owners of small and cheap lots than against the proprietors of those which are more valuable.

"Reasoning fairly from premises known to be true, you can not escape the conclusion that the extravagant and discriminating charges of these corporations are a fraud upon their own charters as well as a gross wrong to their victims. The contracts they invoke to save them from the justice of the State are as strong against them as the constitution itself.

"But there is a power of the State to control them, to check their rapacity, and to make them honest, which lies back of all this. The police authority, of which she can not disarm herself if she would, enables her to regulate the use, even of private property, in such manner that neither the general public nor particular individuals can be made to suffer by it unjustly. Upon that principle you can forbid an excessive rate of interest upon the loan of money, fix the charges of hack drivers, or ferrymen, or tavern keepers or the owners of grain elevators.

"Besides all that, the State can abolish a monopoly or bring it to terms of justice at any time by virtue of her right of eminent domain. All property, corporeal and incorporeal, is held upon condition that it may be divested whenever the general interest requires it. All charters and acts of incorporation are subject to such modification as may be necessary to prevent the owners from doing wrong to the public. This principle was expressed in the constitution by the amendment of 1856, but that was not its origin; it existed from time immemorial as a rule of public and universal law. It has always been one of the powers of every sovereign government, and it applies with equal force to all charters, whether dated before or after 1856.

"These are arguments in favor of the power. Except in Pennsylvania, it would not be necessary to state them. Everywhere else the most zealous advocates of corporate monopoly concede the authority in question, while they deprecate its exercise. But here the shallow notion still lingers that an act of incorporation is an irrevocable license to defraud and plunder whomsoever the managers please to select as their prey.

"I have hesitated to speak of free tickets. I can understand how a thing so cheap might be accepted as a mere courtesy, like a drink or a dinner. Perhaps, therefore, it is not malum in se. But since 1874 no man can hold office without taking an oath to obey the constitution, which expressly prohibits free passes. Can that oath be violated with a safe conscience? I am a private citizen, and I speak with respect for the better judgment of others when I say that executive and judicial officers who have acted thus during the last 10 years ought to be impeached and removed from their places. But that is easier said than done, for the house of representatives, which should prefer the impeachment, and the senate, which has exclusive jurisdiction to try it, are tarred nearly all over with the same stick.

"The legal predicament in which this practice places the railroad officers is somewhat worse. The passes which they distribute are things of considerable value; worth, perhaps, two or three hundred dollars apiece, and hundreds of thousands altogether. If the agents of the company would bring up that much money in a bag at the first meeting of every legislature and hand it around to the members, dishing out their shares to the judges and executive officers, it would look very much like wholesale bribery. But to bribe an officer it is not necessary that money should be used. Giving or offering 'anything of value, testimonial, privilege, or personal advantage,' is, by the constitution and the statute, the same crime as giving silver dollars, gold eagles, or greenbacks. It must appear, however, that it was given to influence the officer or member of the general assembly in the performance of his public or official duties. That is undoubtedly the very purpose and object of giving passes to members of the legislature. I do not say or think that those senators and representatives who receive them consent to be so influenced. But that does not redeem the guilt of the giver, to whom it is impossible to ascribe any other intent than the criminal one. Those great corporate officers and their respectable subordinates, who are concerned directly and indirectly in these practices, are probably ignorant of the existing law. They ought to be solemnly warned by some penal enactment directly and exclusively aimed at this besetting sin.

"We are often told that in this struggle for honest government against the power of the railroad corporations the just cause has no chance of success. We do seem to be out on a forlorn hope. The little finger of monopoly is thicker than the loins of the law.

"The influence of our enemies over the legislature is mysterious, incalculable, and strong enough to make the constitution a dead letter in spite of oaths to obey it and a popular demand, almost universal, to enforce it. There is no other subject upon which the press is so shy as upon this, the most important of all. Afraid to oppose the corrupt corporations and ashamed to defend them, it sinks into silent neutrality. Prudent politicians always want a smooth road to run on, and the right path here is full of impediments. In this state of things we seem to be weaker than we really are, for the unbroken heart of the people is on the side of justice, equality, and truth. Monopolists may sneer at our blundering leadership and the unorganized condition of our common file, but they had better bethink them that, when the worst comes to the worst, our raw militia is numerous enough to overwhelm their regulars, well paid and well drilled as they are. They have destroyed the business of hundreds for one that they have favored. For every millionaire they have made 10,000 paupers, and the injured parties lack no gall to make oppression bitter.

"The people certainly got one immense advantage over the carrying corporations when they adopted the seventeenth article of the constitution. That concedes to us all the rights we ask, puts the flag of the Commonwealth into our hands, and consecrates our warfare. The malign influence that heretofore has palsied the legislative arm can not last forever. We will continue to elect representatives again and again, and every man shall swear upon the gospel of God that he will do us the full and perfect justice which the constitution commands. At last we will rouse the 'conscience of a majority, screw their courage to the sticking place, and get the appropriate legislation' which we need so sorely.

"Whenever a majority in both houses become independent enough to throw off the chains which now bind them to the service of monopoly; when frequent repetitions of the oath to obey the constitution shall impress its obligation upon their hearts; when admonition and reproof from within and without, 'line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little,' shall have taught them that fidelity to the rights of the people is a higher virtue than subserviency to the mere interests of a corrupt corporation; when the seventeenth article shall have been read and reread in their hearing often enough to make them understand the import of its plain and simple words—then, without further delay and with no more paltry excuses, they will give us legislation appropriate, just, and effective. A tolerably clear perception of their duty, coupled with a sincere desire to do it, will enable them to catch the shortest and the easiest way. All trifling with the subject will cease at once; all modes of evading this great point will go out of fashion; no contrivance will be resorted to of ways not to do it while professing to be in favor of it; our common sense will not be insulted by the offer of a civil remedy to each individual for public offenses which affect the whole body of the people and diminish the security of all men's rights at once. The legislative vision, relieved from the moral strabismus which makes it crooked, now will see straight through the folly of trying to correct the general evil except by the one appropriate means of regular punishment at the suit of the State. Does this seem harsh? Certainly not more severe than any other criminal law on our statute book which applies to railway managers as well as to everybody else. They need not suffer the penalty unless they commit the crime, and they will not commit the crime if you make a just penalty the legal consequence. Pass a proper law to-day and they will be as honest as you are to-morrow. Every one of them can be trusted to keep clear of acts which may take him to the penitentiary. They have been guilty in their past lives and will continue in evil doing for some time to come, because the present state of your laws assures them that they shall 'go unwhipped of justice.' But threaten them with a moderate term of imprisonment and a reasonable fine, and they will no more rob a shipper on the railroad than they will pick your pocket at a prayer meeting. Your law will do its work without a single prosecution. Thus you could, if you would, effect a perfect reform and yet not hurt a hair on any head—'a consummation most devoutly to be wished.'

"But it is not to be expected that such good will come immediately. Nearly 10 years ago the legislature was commanded to carry out the beneficent measure of the constitution. For 9 years that illustrious body was a dumb impediment to the course of justice, all its faculties paralyzed by some inscrutable influence—dead, devoid of sense and motion, as if its only function was to 'lie in cold abstraction and to rot.' At last, when it was wakened up by the present governor and reminded of the seventeenth article, it opened its mouth and spoke as one who did not know whether he was sworn to oppose the constitution or to obey it. Some members have shown their utter hostility to it, some seem willing to defend small portions of it, and one senator discovered that it was all equally sacred. But his plan meets no favor. Still we need not despair. The people and the constitution, mutually supporting one another, will be triumphant yet. Meanwhile let all the railroad rings rejoice. This is their day; ours is to come."

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know what subject the gentleman intends to discuss.

Mr. SIMS. I am not even certain that I will extend my remarks at all. It seemed to be going so easy this morning that I thought I would get permission, too.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Upon what subject does the gentleman intend to print remarks, if he does print them?

Mr. SIMS. I will not disclose that subject.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Unless the gentleman discloses his subject, I shall object.

Mr. SIMS. A number of gentlemen have not disclosed their subjects, and you ought to treat them all alike.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Every gentleman who has obtained permission has disclosed his subject.

Mr. SIMS. I will not do it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that previous to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] other requests were granted where gentlemen did not state the subjects of their remarks.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In every instance?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] obtained unanimous consent.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But he stated the purpose for which he desired to extend his remarks.

Mr. SIMS. My colleague [Mr. AUSTIN] made the same request without stating the subject of his remarks, and the gentleman did not object.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] did not state the subject of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Some of them did and some of them did not.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understood that each one did.

Mr. MURDOCK. Neither the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] nor the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] stated the subjects on which they proposed to extend remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] stated that he wished to print a speech by Jeremiah S. Black, one of the greatest lawyers this country ever produced.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from South Dakota will withdraw his objection to the request of my colleague. I did obtain permission to extend some remarks without stating upon what subject I intended to treat.

Mr. PAYNE. But is the gentleman sure that his colleague wants to extend his remarks in the RECORD? He says he is not certain himself.

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, I want to give him the privilege if he desires it.
